Excerpt From "A Daily Consciousness"

Ryan Landolfi
The Gila thaws, playing regal.
A rock among rocks in the blaring Sun.
Risk the spine says the Sun, searching for a gladiator. But he speaks through the air, finding nothing but sandstone and cactus skin,
he continues his glare.

Says the Gila: I’ve a sore throat and I don’t know how to cook.
My stomach is bare, and my hole freezes in the night. Every morning I take longer to reanimate, my cold blood phases from blue to red and some days I want to stay underground and let the torpor prove its right.

A diamondback slides near and smiles hungry.

The Gila off balance: I’ll
have to bite you,
even you without ears.

The Sun lusters a few degrees sharper in a white stare.

The snake: neither of us have ears, friend.