Lessons Hard As Bread
On the Bombing of Iraq

At five o'clock
I listen to what I cannot hear Words fall or hang in haze at perfect random-- desert radio clinically mad
--names that cling to every object every one will he will they really

She calls me each Wednesday at the same time saying I don't want to cut myself please stop me she has tiny scars like lace over every inch when I talk to her my voice goes gentle as hers is flat I say tell me what you feel now she says the blade itself directs her to draw it carefully across her arm I say tell me what you feel now she says it's bleeding I feel better because it hurts so much her life in the moments between pain and pain

All I want is the truth All I want I so clearly cannot have
In the night sky I see bombers flying over men and women who lie, together in love the missiles of our ignorance that hurt us and protect us from harm.
Solveig Visits the Land of Her Ancestors

One understands from the literature that Scandinavian countries are so clean the only unemployment the result of undesirables—we know who we mean—and unfortunate misunderstandings with the Lapps. So of course the first person she talks to reminds her of her father, unshaven, drunk, in need of a fix. Norway's a fine country, he tells her, but you know the welfare cheats. Yes, she looks him straight in the eye, she knows the people he means. They live in old train cars, liberated truck trailers, grow gardens in whorls of tractor tires. Their children go barefoot on the outskirts of Oslo, and never wonder if the American beyond the cobbled fence finally knows she's home.
Solveig Drives to Chicago on a Whim

What she finds there is fire, the city burning with the summer sun. A man crosses in front of her car with a spear and a salmon dripping yellow gore.
The address she seeks is imaginary: if she knew someone once in this town, he is not here now. But she looks anyway, in the window-panes reflecting a painful brightness, the lake roiling then still. In the Planetarium the illusion of evening recalls every August night the Pleiades ruptured and fell, but there is no coolness off the lake, no air-conditioning functional in the whole bloody town, and she's already tired of muggy parks and expensive shoes walking down the softening pavement. Solveig leaves her car with an attendant, and heads for the beach, wades in fully-clothed. Among the stinking alewives floating carefully with her gauze skirt to the surface, she is hardly surprised to look back on the city, see her parked car burst into spontaneous flame.
Corridors of Breath  (Solveig at Tule Lake) for Barry Lopez, and Phil

Solveig wakes in silence the uneasy drift of wild grain and rice the language she holds in her mouth breaking down like a fine clay

One marsh hawk hangs for an instant over the distant internment camp It is an old story, like winter like a boy gazing through wire at the snow geese returning

And a knot of teal rises and churns along the shoreline, the sound of wings against wings, against air They are not at home here They are at home in motion

And now a chiaroscuro of the geese against black water, their voices incongruous, the sound of metal filings But what does she know of birds?

There is a language she holds in her heart spilling bead by bead into the blood She is learning to read an alphabet scrawled of willows under early snow

And the noisy punctuation of snow geese in formation as they roll into a headwind seamless movement bringing thousands to the ground, gently, like falling leaves For days she has been listening With Solveig Near Gibbon Pass

Two skiers at ridgetop push against veils of falling snowflakes almost as large as small fists. Imagine the kind of tension that holds a mountain ready in avalanche weather. They have skied all day, he is tired of the way Solveig seems to carry a secret knowledge to herself. He listens: in this place danger echoes, or is silent.
And then she too pauses, strikes the kind of pose that means she's aware of being watched. And why not?
She's handsome enough to take a mirror for granted, or the flash reflection crimson on the eastern slope.

Nearby,
the ghost for which the pass is named turns in his sleep. His dreams are barbaric.
He holds a stone in his mouth the size and shape of a baby's fist to keep him from screaming. Each night he prepares again for the last battle. Colonel John Gibbon, brevet general, waiting for dawn.

A stiff dusk freezes up their skis but they begin to kick a sullen diagonal path across the mountain's crust. Solveig turns away for the tiny cabin not two miles off, tracing the ache of her shoulders with the dragging beat of pole and pole but his whistle brings her back.

_Idiot_, he hisses. _That's a good way to get us both killed_. She snaps back _give it a rest_ and then he draws his finger across his throat meaning _shut up_ and continues breaking trail in moonless silence.

Dark forms of trees dissolve. He sees streaks of light against the backs of his eyes and nothing.

[stanza break]
All night
The One Who Limps leads his men drinking whiskey from Fort Shaw.
Someone suggests taking only beautiful women prisoners and Gibbon says no, no prisoners, but go ahead and have your fun first.
When dawn breaks open like a summer melon and the shapes cf tents emerge among willows.
Gibbon aims the first shot at a horseherder dozing on the hill above.
In minutes the August dust is thick as confusion, women, boys, and horses making for cover along the river.
A mother returns for her suckling daughter in time to see a corporal raise his gunbutt and bring it down hard against the cradleboard.
This night, the grandmothers shall wail in their flight, their horses refuse to eat the acrid grasses.

Inside
the lighted cabin they rub each other's frost bitten fingers and cheeks and drink harsh swallows of whiskey from a metal flask.
Forgiveness is on neither of their minds but the sting is gone from his throat and she looks at him in a way that contains the snow, makes it soft again despite the wind. Outside, the ice face slips another inch, waiting for the ghost to turn again.
Solveig at Agate Beach

In ocean light her eyes reflect bars of color in the rock, iron captured in the glint of glass. We marvel at the roundness of stone, the tenacity of seaweed, the sweet pain of barnacles razoring flesh. She asks me, ‘have you ever had to pick a lock with a knife? Between my fingers I hold a rock crab as an answer, knowing its fury, how many times it has been captive before. You’re just like him, she cries, gritting her teeth and spitting toward the newly-risen moon. If I could speak now I would touch the scars down the length of each arm, the ones I never asked about, and know it is enough to live, in water.

In the tide pools, in the half-light, we find a purple starfish pulsing blindly. Every thing surviving the tug of water makes its way here: sea urchin, rock crab, a friendship stranded momentarily on gravel.

The last man on the beach flies away with the gulls and we follow a rill to land’s end, cleft like a woman. Solveig kicks up sand in absent faces, her body bruised but strong, running running for joy. We swim out against the tide, colliding like flotsam in our eagerness to be free of the land. Solveig laughs and sputters out the sea tang, remaining a woman among rocks and angles. Although she might have wished it different, here she is, all breasts and round and tough. We were talking about how it is that a line becomes a curve, how it summons the nerve to diverge out into space, calling the waves to curl and lick and smooth the sand. We were talking the way women do, about nothing.

about lying on the dry beach in moonlight or making love on a flat rock in the moments before daybreak. It is a way of healing, this ebb and flow of words, a way of tasting ourselves grown whole one word at a time.

Solveig rises from the water now and arcs her long hair back to touch it again, her belly full and round like another moon.
I dive and surface in surprise to see this tall woman flowering above the salt water.
Letter to Stella from the Northlands

It's been a long time, honey, since those bees and sons of bees we used to find in the cottonwoods gave us whatfor on the matted riverbanks. Seems funny now I know that every one of those pricks results eventually in a lost stinger and finally death, preferably the slow, painful kind. I remember what you told me after, that nothing hurts like the way they won't look at you then, crawling back into their shorts and rugby shirts striped yellow and black, and I want to say Stella, you know we have such sweet tooths, let's just eat up these flowers: carpels, pistils, filaments, anthers--keep all this honey for ourselves. Love, Solveig Lucrezia's Elegy to Rage

Goodbye, my sweet

You've served me well, the way sunlight imprisoned in ruby or garnet shines out to catch the eye, rows of bottles of burgundy along the window, aging to fine, dry fire. I hold a chalice encrusted with gemstones; I hold it in myself, full and flowing against the tidal pull of blood, my heart's salty engine, the corrosion of years. Only now that the cupboard is bare can I unhand these keys, give my poor love a bone. Let him see how my skin's become a thin cotton cloth, sponging away stain of meat and drink. Beware. I turn liquid. I pour myself over the lip of the cup. Let him drink.
Das Boot

1) Leaving the Wilma Theater

Seeping light mingles with our stale breath.
A clock strikes, and time is the heavy red curtain falling on the fields, my eyes still flooded with foreign soil. Each explosion echoes softer as we leave the hall.

But this flick stays lodged behind my teeth, as though just now I saw my red-haired brother brought home in bruised detail, crouching and frightened beside the U-boat our Navy kept shelling.
He is no Nazi. His gaze shifts like dry sand but names me the judge, the victim, the axman, and I rehearse all these parts. My friends walk lockstep over the bridge, embarrassed by the crazy woman they find yelling there's a war going on. Hot wind breaks loose above the river, and sour dust scourcs my smooth heart blind. A blood hush over the water darkens, the sky falls like sparks to the fading earth.

2) For the Columbia River

Suckers choke the gorge, bodies bloated and shining in the clear light below Alberton. I imagine a boat slices the river—what I see is its wake, a painless slipstream we follow and only rarely break.
Maybe it isn't the boat we take for granted but the notion that we name the evil and it fades. Maybe what is real are the fish with their silver bellies dying in the water we too call home, or the men with their forgetful creels who line the banks and dream of shells and shrapnel and coming back alone.
Kent State

Porch swings, lawns, barbeque pits, maples and here and there a red trike, careening from curb to curb, sheepdog bluffing 'a low growl. We cruise block after block on the green expanse of boulevards, watch the angry lake backing away and storming forward to the edge of tool-and-dies.
Milwaukee suspended in a cloud of malt.

I think: this can't be home then remember that tuna casserole evening I shivered in the leather armchair, staring at the screen, while a girl, held in a lap, mouth twisted and moaning, bled to death on television and I wondered if these children were criminals or could uniforms be wrong. It was my brother, not I, who rose from dinner in his quiet sadness, my father, still eating, not to be moved, confused by a family he never learned to know.

Two thousand miles away and even now, in another greening suburb and a life I pave for myself, that night bothers like a hangnail, ignored but insistent.
Religion I'd abandoned and saviors faded like family picture albums show up again on my nightstand. Someone holds a block party, and we take turns talking politics and babysitters over Seagram's on the rocks. We are children putting up the badminton net and we divide and rotate like clockwork and laugh and brush off time with mosquitoes that come on the evening breeze.

War doesn't touch us here. Still, I name these people I will never know, the father and son, the school board member, the woman with her deaf child, her face open and searching toward the hills as she turns him to face the sunset.
Now I can feel the damp lake wind and the twining of neighbor to neighbor with a bond of cucumber.
I see men and women dance together in the shadows as though they knew the music, or night, or madness.

The Boneless Chicken Ranch

for Dennis Held

It's the flesh we're after here. Why not abandon the hapless search for a skeleton on which to hang it all? We cluck and crow over every white stone as though even a poem could break open from the inside, exposing the live peeping kernel of truth, finally unable to survive without its calcareous shell. It's a feat of engineering alright, the way we fatten and glow, shankless piles of feathers and meat, pecking at anything moving or still: kitchen scraps, cockroach, corn mash, raindrops in the thick dust. But we long to stand up for our rights, tell ourselves, "We're not just drumsticks on the hoof"—if only we had the pluck. Then at last we could open our wings to the lightening sky, open our mouths, and sing.
Country of Dogs

I have never been anywhere but sick. In a sense, sickness is a place, more instructive than a trip to Europe.

—Flannery O'Connor

Pain can be that way, licking or tearing at the hard node nestled like a still child between her hips. But she is not pregnant, only traveling to her hometown in a distant country she carefully unfolds, like a road map of her short life. She leans her head away and back against the seat, the jet a Doberman that whines and paces down the run. Beside her, a baby shrieks, the mother smooths his downy head.

She thinks of her own mother in that town which may not exist, who buys bread wrapped in white paper and carries her with it—two loaves instead of one. She is four years old again, sunlight the color of honey, and in that year, with the smell of egg noodles and dill, steel tanks roll into the streets. When the men come to the bright apartment, she sees only their dogs, fearsome teeth bared, she crawls into the pantry moaning with fear and crambs bread in her mouth, the dough heavy like stones in her gut.

She has never raised her voice in anger. The plane lunges miraculously into air, fragile body, metallic muscle and skin, as she remembers finding her mother outside the kitchen, bloody skirt covering her blank milky eyes. On the door in black the words she cannot read but traces with her vomit-stained fingers: Slut. Whore. Traitor. She knows the dogs will not find her now, even in the city she left as a child, but the cancer snarls in her pelvis like a hatred, teaching her the lesson hard as bread.
Waiting For My Beginnings
Eggs

A red Porsche flashes down the grey Dakota highway, its light and heat fusing lives inside like test bombs astray in November Badlands. To the west, Montana, they return again and again, giving sullen Thanks for their new and breaking marriage, wherever it's been in the meanwhile. She carries eggs from her family ranch, carries them carefully as a carton of jeweled Russian heirlooms or a sleeping baby. They argue about the road to take, he pulls over and stops the car. They'll ruin the upholstery, he says. They're a gift.

she shakes her head and his hand slides easily to the .45 beneath the seat and rises. Now, he says, and the eggs fly like frightened hens through the opened window. I would not tell you this but for one thing: I am the single egg left unbroken and waiting for my beginnings. The car swerves down the road ahead, and I lie and hold myself ready to explode.
The House I Lived In

Was a trailer, a box like the cardboard one my dad would shut me into and sit on till I stopped
screaming
The house I lived in
was a "mobile home" we moved six times before I was five
The house I lived in cannot be found anywhere
Like evidence it is best hidden
The house I lived in I carry with me raindrops on a tin roof wake me from a claustrophobic dream
screaming
Daddy
Braces and Bras

I was first in my grade to have both as if the development of teeth was up till then exclusive of the development of tits. Mom declined to comment, slipping the offending garment directly into my wardrobe still nestled in its plain brown wrap.
I had to wait to try it on until she went out with dad, certain that wearing it without a good reason would be a venial sin. That breasts, like teeth, were subject to corrective penance.

I can't say I knew nothing of the facts of life. That summer, my friends and I played tennis and clarinets in bikinis and white anklets, hoping for the perfect tan the way surfers await a wave. We lobbed those balls like white planets over the fence and into the orbits of boys mowing the lawn, but even then we knew they had better things to do.
The first one I ever kissed, in the public library, wore braces too. Our mouths did not lock. Worse. He cut his tongue.
I tasted salt like a first communion with the living.

My teeth have since returned to their old haunts. My breasts migrated south and stayed on. I retain my ambivalence for braces and bras.
When I was nearly sixteen my father pulled me aside to view his favorite centerfold, nude but playing, impossibly, the clarinet. How suddenly clear he hadn't had my embouchure fixed for nothing.
Leaving the Oregon Coast

There's a breeze I sing for myself on nights like this, the same tune of moss and damp earth you must have hummed once the grate of road noise left your ears.
You stood by the cycle, still warm like the space where a woman's lain, stared just a moment at the hills you always seem to leave, squared your pack toward California. You raced a train outside Kerby, dangerous game of conscience full of abandoned wives, other sinners, cold steel bruising like a gun at your temple until the redwoods cruised into view. Now you're safe. We can't blame you but we always will. You passed the next two payphones at seventy, saved the dime for an egg with Tabasco in Santa Cruz. The sea there washes calm tonight, the whiskey smooth, and outside your motel window only shadows croon dusky blues through the trees.
Landscape with Winter Moon

Some days, there's nothing to do but call it quits. Even the creek freezes in mid-sentence and the fire chokes in the ash-full stove. He feeds the dogs on venison scraps, locks the heavy door, then stumbles into the wind on stubbornness and his one remaining leg.

Fifty-two years and the cattle never went hungry, he mutters to the cottonwood. Straw and molasses, thistles, salt. The years of my marriage went by and by, so poor we hunted mushrat and mole. Well, choose between the sun and moon, I told her. Train left Drummond in a blizzard like this and never came back. Now the evenings stand empty like jars that held bittersweet cherries they picked together. In the snow the cold becomes unbearable, first in his missing leg, then the good foot numbs. A thin doe twists through the willow thicket Gotta mend fence and he kicks his boots into the creek. Marta, he calls to the storm. I swear we'll break even this spring, and we find him later, eyes open and glazed, stare frozen on the gibbous moon.
The Road Home

Magician who charms barley from the sullen ground, conjure me a ptarmigan from lowland willows. Will it nestle unafraid in your hands, leather caverns worn harsh from baling twine?

My gangling limbs strove here too among soybean shoots and wondrous pleats of corn, and I have come back to these rich swells a stranger, burying my feet in the earth.
I want to slow dance in the dusty rain, learn to throw back the husk and silk of my hair to drink it in.
We'll erase the road that careens back into narrow streets and windowboxes, the substance of gutter nightmares. We'll grow fat and ripe in the ochre flash of the river at sunset.

Returned to my house of starving brick a sparrow receives the sunflower, body and blood of August heat. Here at the altar of my window I bury for you the root of summer, and water it, and raise this grey city to life.
Speaking of Tongues

In the real land of memory I keep seeing strangers, the brighter avatars of shadows on the tip of my flaming tongue.
They walk out of closets, stream in through the windows, like pestilence that crosses unbloodied sills.

Listen. Only what's beautiful is written, committed to language. As: the graceful arc of body to body, moving to deepen and hum. As: your mouth on my throat, on the silk skin of hip and thigh.

How then can I tell you this story, bitter and graceless as sand?
When I was very young he said it was for you he taught the art of pleasure; when I was older he said for me.
My tongue is burning still, a slapped face, a stubbed toe, trying to please you in this terrible way.

Since not in loving does betrayal wait, but its articulation, for speaking is like crying, and crying the one desire I may refuse him.

In the land we imagine is real I see my father towering over, his shadow darkens the faces I find most beautiful.
You reach to smooth my hair, an act without words, and I see my story for the first time turn, take on its fearsome grace.
Sisyphus Comes to the Oxford Bar/Cafe

I never held much stock in angels. I wake each day to the same dull ache of morning news and scrambled eggs as any man, punch in, bend down to the talus and this damn rock.

He dips his toast into the grease his eggs leave behind and tells how he was born into the sound of the sea and grew to love those restless waves and the women who ebb and flow on the sand. He spits politely when I refill his cup:

Same old story. It was the wife brought me 'here, Montana. No idea what happened to all that salt water. She could be a country western singer. She could be you, dark like that and pretty but she's no angel either, left me flat in the middle of town. But I'm not sorry.

This rock and me will wear a groove in the dust. I'll stop to feel it slip from my arms, see the wind cover my tracks. But there are olive trees that line the way down. And I'm not sorry.
Knitting

His hand drops, body stilling toward sleep, and a wash of air rushes through the screen swirling the fine silk of his hair so unlike my own. I wind and unwind soft wool on my needles, knitting: a slight meditation on the warmth my child has recently left. Time coats his skin like a skin, a sweater of dreams that will be taken from him one by one but for now, each breath tossed away, like bathwater, measures time as protector, as keeper. And the way his hands fold themselves carefully in sleep, a man’s gesture, as solemn as it is unconscious, reveals that prayer is only another means of falling gracefully into life. The child stirs, then returns to his dreams, moored by blankets to the ragged world. I cast off loose ends and thoughts, complete the chain of this yarn which, after all, is my own.
Snapshot: With Cathy at Nine-Mile Creek

We lean our ribs against the bridge rail our cheesy grins more tangible somehow than the river moving immovable below. An osprey catches the light and holds it for an instant still. Behind us the walls of Alberton Gorge swallow the river whole, as ignorant of our lives as perhaps we ourselves.
We are a study in contrasts—your jeans tucked neatly into boots, my shirttails flapping ragged beneath a sweatshirt full of holes and motor oil.
But elsewhere, strangers remark that every gesture copies every gesture that we could be sisters, or maybe lovers, with the habit of likeness.

When I look now I see how far away that water has carried us from one another: me from Nine-Mile to Europe and into a marriage I only half-remember, while you flew from love into love, coast to coast to coast.
For years we spoke only by phone, two o’clock tears from Ketchikan, Boston, Merced, whenever someone did you dirt, until your life seemed as removed from mine as the osprey’s, glinting white and fierce in a pewter sky above the river.

You send me postcard that asks Why do I stake my life on this man?
How can I answer? We’ll drift together again, always, like the rare loons floating today on the Clark Fork below.
We can follow this river as far as it goes, but in the picture before me your arm fits tightly through mine. We mug for a boyfriend whose name escapes us both.
Anniversary and Pastorale

How is it these shoes outlast the marriage thay were bought to celebrate? Five years later soft as gloves they still conform like creamy lambs to the contours and hills of my feet.
One after the other they jostle each other from the closet in search of sweetgrass one eye apiece on the cloudless sky a polyphony of birdsong and murmuring bees rising on the red dust of their wake.
On this day, how audacious to keep dancing round and round in the flowerbed trampling on the violets so carefully tended. How unexpectedly they kick up their heels.
Still Life With Anne Desbaresdes

Magnolia petals drift above the table suspended in the polished illusion of depth a handsome piece of furniture can offer. The hand picks at the petals, picks at the meat of the flower, heavy with a scent no man mistakes for another.
There, between her breasts, a secret.
Outside the window she hears a sea wind shatter bloom after bloom, the fingers absently crushing a softness with softness, a fine waxy terror tracing their meaningless shapes.
[for edward estlin] after this (form organic curving falling) we'll have none of that cast out onto the unctuous sea like a gurry of merciless image,oily swimming salvation made somehow insignificant next your rolling wavecrest hair green sailor's eyes (save its empty knell)

for to have nothing implies nothing even if it is my heart Because we do nothing by half-measures we walk barefoot in the snow in our house until the skin peels until the scales fall from our fingers and tongues.

Because we aren't known for restraint the howling inside us breaks open, spilling like sacks of flour, and wakes a storm behind the eyes, inside the skin.

We breathe this accident of weather the freezing and careful thawing the blinding whiteness you say reminds you of a wind, a wind that rises and stings like love.
Domestic Film Noir

Oblique, as in footsteps clicking all night hollow heels in the empty street.
If life were film noir, which it is, the streetlight would slant through the blinds and the potted palm and your hair and come to rest beside me on the bed, but this can only be seen from the outside where it's been raining for three days, and here you are, you stand and stare icecubes clicking all night as I toss off the sheet like a husk and begin to strip in the planetary glow of television and moon.
How your eyes lick their lips, how your lips twitch and burn in the streetlight slanting through my hair, and when I stand straight as I can how much money could buy this rainy planetary glow outside or inside.
On the television, a woman is lying beneath the sheets, the man coaxing come here baby and beneath the screen I move the potted palm so you can lie more comfortably beside me.
You toss off the drink and begin to strip. I lick my lips before we kiss, you touch my hair you touch the sheet, we hear hollow heels in the empty street and the rain as it slants against the glass, the way it burns like a stare, oblique, as in footsteps.
I dreamed I had been chewing on pearls a way of saying I thought you beautiful and so you are.
Each pearl cracked open before turning to gravel revealing how language turned first lustrous, then opaque: words we consoled each other with, every night the same strand breaking, falling to the floor, holding pearls in my mouth as you hold another's. What, you ask, if things were different, what if we held instead strings of sapphire, tourmaline, hard stones that will not break, that don't accrete but simply shine and shine. We'd move that way through time without tasting this bitter grit, our eyes caught on glinting pebbles, fixing us in the moment of dissolution and birth.
For what is sand to an oyster but an excuse for loveliness, what is a pearl but the milky eye of a pig regarding his options, starving in his fat armor, tearing at roots and gravel.
He must cast his own lot, and swallow.
Untitled

White on white, strawberry blossoms on the bed of April snow. Too late to recover the shoots, we stay inside and ponder a single frozen flower, how it shatters in the palm of my hand.

Three mornings I have sheltered the blossoms, impatient because I would bring you their fruits in winter, complicated and dazzling as a cardinal, gold flecks catching his wing. His black eye watches, steady, as we watch him through the window. What will it regard in a month, when it's warmer; in a year, when we are gone from this place? A man and a woman will lie here waiting. They will spend their whole lives waiting, for this snowstorm, for this cardinal, for this strawberry against your lips. They wait even now as he startles and blurs, the red streak both tangy and sweet.
Gathering Voices

When the dead appear to us suddenly, like primroses unexpected and pungent, we hold out our hands at once and are burned. The gunpowder sweetness of voices sears the mind, bearing witness at once to the troubling absence of fear and the damp sheen spreading over our skin and our clothes. It is early to feel this way. Whole lives are spent looking away in regret from scenes barely apprehended or meshed. We reach again warily toward fire or bare earth, to learn what was meant and what left unspoken. But here are the roses: we've placed them in baskets and opened the curtains. Light touches the petals, and delicate stamens unfurling like stories we tell when it rains. Now, ask the voices. Of what are you certain.

Reasons I Am Not A Revolutionary

for François Camoin

One  I asked Fidel not to bring his rifle home. We are civilized people here.

Two  I taught myself to drive an automobile when I was twenty-four. I learned on a late-model Lincoln, but I also drove a 1958 Ford convertible, a Cadillac, and an old Nash. I liked the leather upholstery between my legs. Campesinos stared at me when I drove in the country, but of course they didn't know who I was.

Three One of the hardest things was finding shoes in my size. I'll never go barefoot again. My feet swelled up like breadfruit, sprouted blisters the size of quarters, turned green with fungus. I covered them with newspaper so no one could see.

Four Sometimes listening to Fidel is like baseball on a transistor radio. He doesn't speak my language. But the noise is exciting.

Five I went to every single department store in Havana. Sometimes with Concha, usually by myself; she remembers the old days, and weeps for her brother who was killed, and she wishes they had burned all of the cane fields when they had the chance. The way home meanders past Lo Basto, where it is considered unseemly for a woman to go.

Six The palmettos cast shadows against my window that look like helicopter blades. I dream of men in uniform, but I'm never sure if it's a nightmare.

Seven Some people would call this holy ground. Sancti Spiritus. I know Concha would like to go to bed with Fidel.

Eight He's already told me what he thinks of her. A sweet ass, he says. She has no sense of color or style. I might say.

Nine Another thing is his cigars.

Ten I have a shot glass from a previous trip to Key West. It has a picture of Hemingway etched on it in three colors. Fidel uses it to take his laxative.

Eleven He told me about the woman he had in New York. She was blonde and wore a turtleneck and knew Garcia Lorca's poetry by heart. But she kept the turtleneck on.

Twelve I love Fidel but he needs a trim.

Thirteen Oh Mama, you told me to keep my legs crossed.

Fourteen Fidel keeps pictures of all the people who have helped him: Khruschev, Kosygin, myself. I think he even keeps a picture of Kennedy somewhere. I've heard Kennedy's wife is unfaithful to him. The man has it coming to him, anybody can see that.

Fifteen I bought a two-piece swimming suit. A bikini. I should feel bad. Peasant babies wear less than this in the fields.

Sixteen The army is beautiful. The fires are beautiful. I tried to learn to love the guns. I caressed them in passing, and felt how they were smooth like long limbs. Stared at their dull glint by firelight and moonlight and sighed. Ignored the thud of bootees into kidneys. Said all this was necessary for law and order. Maybe vital. Certainly only natural.

Seventeen Here are some people I met during this time who later disappeared: a French student who came to aid the revolution, who broke his glasses to show they were bourgeois; a homosexual hairdresser with needle tracks up his arms; a black woman with her light-skinned child; a dried-up crone from Grand Cayman; an inventor of plastics; the daughter of an American politico.

Eighteen I lay in the back seat of the Nash and thought about the sun.

Nineteen We are civilized people.
Twenty I can't tell you how long it's been since I came from my village on the other side of the island.

Twenty-one I chose a boy from among the guerrillas in Cienfuegos, and asked him to drive me home to Calle Suedo.

Twenty-two Why do we need a revolution anyhow?

Twenty-three In general I tried. I think I can say that much. I loved the guns; I loved the burning cane fields that smelled like dried sweet corn; I loved the rustling bushes and the fear that crouched like death behind each of them; I loved the sweet burst melons.

Twenty-four There are some things a Catholic must not be forced to do.

Twenty-five Luscious island boy. He took me in the back seat of the Nash outside the apartment I share with Fidel, and I pressed my finger to his lips and told him he must not make a sound while I sucked on each of his fingers and listened to the birds. Haw-hey-haw. Raucous sons of bitches.

Twenty-six I had trouble in confession. No one could tell me what was a sin.

Twenty-seven I gave my car keys to anyone who asked: Che Guevara; Josefina Battista; Carolina de Sevilla; a pair of campesinas carrying water; my guerrilla.
Twenty-eight A dream where my father wore fatigues and carried lots of American money. I told him he was crazy for trying to sleep with my husband. I have only had that dream once. Usually in my dreams I am the one who is crazy. Now and then I dream about making love tenderly on the beach, but that is rare now.

Twenty-nine Mama warned me not to stray from the Church. Then she fled Cuba with her parish priest.

Thirty Maybe I really am crazy.

Thirty-one I told the boy that I need shoes if I was to join the revolution. And stockings and oils. He told me I was beautiful without those things. No, you don't understand, I said. Yes, I do, he said. Let me show you.

Thirty-two I dropped him off at the Church of San Diego, on the windy side of town over by the market. Would he enter the church? I don't know if he knew then. but I did. He had lost more than his faith that night, more than his belief. Was I a counter-revolutionary? I need to go shopping again.

Thirty-three I made Fidel and Concha dinner in our tiny apartment on the Calle Suedo. We all drank rum, well-aged, then I made an excuse to leave in the Nash and left them to clean up after themselves. They were practically oblivious to anyone but themselves and the rum.

Thirty-four I sat in the Nash and watched the palmettos in the stiff breeze. I'm so tired of these little infidelities.
