Dipped in the World

Jennifer Hiebert

The University of Montana

Follow this and additional works at: https://scholarworks.umt.edu/etd

Let us know how access to this document benefits you.

Recommended Citation
https://scholarworks.umt.edu/etd/2076

This Thesis is brought to you for free and open access by the Graduate School at ScholarWorks at University of Montana. It has been accepted for inclusion in Graduate Student Theses, Dissertations, & Professional Papers by an authorized administrator of ScholarWorks at University of Montana. For more information, please contact scholarworks@mso.umt.edu.
COPYRIGHT ACT OF 1976

This is an unpublished manuscript in which copyright subsists. Any further reprinting of its contents must be approved by the author.

Mansfield Library
University of Montana
Date: 1987
DIPPED IN THE WORLD

By
Jennifer Hiebert
B.A., Bethel College, 1980

Presented in partial fulfillment of the requirements for the degree of Master of Fine Arts
University of Montana
1987

Approved by

Chairman, Board of Examiners

Dean, Graduate School

Date
Flame follows flame, and the world is a word on fire that you have to hold.

William Stafford

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

Thanks are due all of the people who gave advice and consent in the production of this manuscript, especially Patricia Goedicke. I owe an incalculable debt as well to my parents, who taught me to read and allowed me to think, and who read themselves. Some of the poems in this thesis have appeared in different form in Cache Review and ACM.
III. Keeping the Faith

<table> <thead>
<tr>
<th>Title</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr> </thead> <tbody>
<tr>
<td>When the Time Comes</td>
<td>38</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The Bass Creek Commune</td> <td>39</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Half a Year of Dawn</td>
<td>40</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jazz Steps for Renunciation</td> <td>41</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>On the Translation of Species</td> <td>42</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dipped in the World, Keeping the Faith</td> <td>44</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>House Call at Low Tide</td> <td>45</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Thoughts Run Like Weasel Tracks</td> <td>46</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Frogs Answer Spring</td>
<td>47</td>
</tr> </tbody>
</table>
Interview Before Acting Public

1. Throat clear

2. Slight eyebrow lift; hold briefly

3. Air of expectancy

4. Lectern? Forward leaning

5. Do not adjust microphone

6. The air of expectancy is mutual. Do not speak too quickly. Sip the water. Someone raises his hand. You? Simon says black tie optional. So that later everyone greets everyone else with similar pleasure, leaning forward. The media

7. throw their caps into the air, which is blue, por favor.
I. A Capture Nonetheless
Mt. Gothic, Ski Trails Shining

I'm thinking of you as I ski from outhouse to our crusty hill--old companion, with the constellations inscribed on your helmet, who forced the last of that syrupy port on us at four a.m., just to charge through to glory a la harp-thumping spirituals at the other end of the night's haggling over semiotics, mine, and metaphysics, yours. Now there's a moon, another one, shedding soft nonsensical reply, a mad April moon, distributing with drunken glee, rising fuller each night. Fellow rambler, this one, too, will shrink and fade in some clear-sung day rounded off to ordinary. Meantime, the silent piper awash in geometrical water and light cavorting

I've no theories, just now, of language, still less of crisp whys, but I love an image or two: you adjusting my backpack, swaying with harp, you incorrigible, playing basketball in outsized boots, and when you invited me to dance, twirling me into searing laughter

--for Mark Friesen
Fever and Water

You see, when I plowed out after you in my shaky Australian crawl, long unused, I had to yank out the moorings.
So much freedom, water in my mouth, but I was intent on treading breakers enough to catch a glimpse of you some few times out, bobbing. I tied trailing ropes into a lasso I had never learned to throw.
I apologize. To you, the water, the moorings.
It was clumsy, and I am tangled now in my own stricken selves, hindrances all.
When the lighthouse turns, I'll freeze in the beam's pocket, a thrashing coil suspended in a bead. You can tell it along the other moments strung down your line of sight. A whispered admonition lies in each one.
Putting Asunder

It's a betting game, but ordinary things, chips, loose change, have disappeared already-- sucked up through a gash in the space-time continuum, or just wagered away,
the moment-by-moment attrition.
We've hedged our bets with good books, our favorite dinosaurs, a butte that appears in several photographic prints.
My hand is so good. How could I waste it? How can you not be bluffing?
Reduced to a graceful economy, we wager what's left: I add my armspan, the left half of a smile, how it feels to rest under heavy covers.
You see me and raise your hearing and the way your dog howled yesterday.
I throw on my cat staring through a window, add one cheek and my good knee.
You see me and toss to the world heaped up between us the rate at which your hair grows, your passion for roller-coaster rides, your pulse.
I see you and call. You smile slowly, some subtle largesse in the winner's restraint.
News of Boon's Death

Winter, and a van on a road at night, and the speed of light.
I am trying to imagine the breaking axle from within, from the center of the happening as action radiates from the still watching eye, which sees, still rising to consciousness, something nebular, perhaps--I know he was actually asleep, never knew, as they say, though how could you not know you were dying?

But the sensations, I imagine them impinging with an unearthly slow dignity, as if they too knew they were the last; then the instant of recognition and the final flailing quickening--

How the night looks, dirty and browned out in glares circling the car like monkeys on a chain, reflected feverish waves in the opposite blind window.
The precision of ice gives way to girders shot full of holes in rows, and strobed through the chains, eyes straining a corner, the wrench around: pain that verifies.
In the heat a single high note; nerves tinder agitated spiders beneath the skin.

But that's not how it is, someone protested, I've been in an accident, and it's not slow like that at all. So I had it wrong, Boon, the universe wheeling broadly over your December night, the fatal glory expanding from your last self, the childish starburst.

But it is still how your death happened to me, and only after the souped-up, tinklingly precise melodrama could I trace the edges of the anger, walk for miles kicking clots of snow ahead of me, thinking conventional thoughts: too much red ice ground onto Christmas roads: darkly satisfied with myself, thinking of death and of good people who happen to die like the rest of us.
Equipoise and Descent

The flesh of my wishes blurs the bone of what we are.

Too late I see: what I wanted slipped into something wholly unexpected, voluptuous and powerful, scented like jasmine but a darker purple, a tall glass fluted, shielding berries frosted with sugar.

He has drawn this picture again, looks expectantly up at closed curtains where windows could be; cassettes imprinted with every music in the world lie in boxes, bellies up, waiting only to be chosen, the whole world there lying in wait for the choosing.
What he expects. What he wants.

We are paper trees in a Japanese courtyard who have never told on the wind.
The White Horses

The white horses in the pasture are multiplying, Dappled hocks, lily withers, and all.
I have to decipher this turn of events: Lucky or no? It may be neither, but merely Whimsical, and no real breach of conduct.

One, then two, and now three white horses In unnoticed blips appeared, grazing placidly, confident They have not outlived their usefulness.
A swaybacked bay, who held the pasture long Before the advent of the white horses, stands among them Tethered by the calculating magic, unconcerned.
The white horses applaud.
It Was When You Said You'd

Have to go south for the real Terra Nostra jazz, the ladies who live hundreds of years and shrink at last into dolls. No combustion in pumpkins and frost-- duende fled with the warblers. But if the Amazon should prove to be more incandescent, why, I ask, and not here, in these wispier latitudes? Some days I believe the magic is all human, and that here and the Amazon merely guard our deposits. If it should be, however, that we refract this ripeness, and it mothers itself elsewhere, perhaps the Amazon, still I shall ask why. If I must swim to the hot mottled jungle to be with our stubborn magic I shall explain to it how it has bolted jagged through us, that our selves heated it to steam on its way, that it is a tendril of the sly smiles we refuse to turn in our own direction for fear of being scattered into color. A trope on the air, which, after all, moves freely from here to there.
The Mail From Tegucigalpa

Fist fluttering at the shell of heaven—if I could explain to its bearer that her exchange was fair, was more than fair: good, that the tincture of days unbartered and color of privation, the ermine's winter, gained eternity: that sliver in the palm, irritant, latticed guess, the new frame. That the improbable speech of a soul made bold for its very slightness kept its fear hissing fear coiled in a cage, electric for a century; so that my denial was unlocked for having come after, so that facing lissome jeweled life, facing horses with heads of stone, double-headed time, I would wait captured between, freer—Watching Out

When I watch people dance closed and open, caught and sent, something falls away-- "She was fantastic just five minutes in the bar on her way to somewhere else," you said, "I don't know where she learned to dance but it was no soused bar shuffle was real, had leaps just minutes it was stunning"--and I wanted to dance like Alison Rose, wanted you to say

while the snow falling incontinently around me made me dizzy, made me think I was on a precipice while it fell away forever, Disingenuity

I walked out on myself one day.
Oh, you know it happens, spring's aloft, you dress yourself up and instead of so-and-so, talk to the trees or bicycles. Now are you innocent or not when this happens? I know about myself, the only worry how long it'll be before I mooch back in and apologize.
And if I'm gone for good?
This business on my sleeve mere graffiti? Then the end's a crabbed smile, false vitae, the life signed anon. I ask myself please to duck back in just to say it was worthwhile, once.
Dusk Motes

after Wallace Stevens

Unexpected wind everything else in place extcept that it is flying After I cleaned up the wind cleans up but with a different idea of order

White tulip petals yolked at center lance their particular deaths Each curls on itself in singular nuances, mottoes for a pattern acted out in larger terms, say the universe, or burning paper

There is a horse on the hill or perhaps it is a house on the hill a house on the hill from here hard to tell and only a letter difference anyhow and a different idea of scale and the calling is what is conjugal Above, the Mountains Shackled

Aquatic light, violet-injected.
Fog and smoke from houses obscure above us the Rockies' outcrops, ochre elephants shambled here some era before,
standing now, shackled, able only to loom
and bequeath us our veils.

The trees in the yard are caught in attitudes of sorrow.
The elephants are initials which we lost, we, not the trees, which lean into the air, graceful if shot through with ice.

Duskier than we, murmured lower, an eternally amniotic, undulant world, the trees, the elephants, who discover fire together and again, plotlessly, and again forget-- and who midwifed our own breach birth, somewhere outside?
I Dreamed I Had To Save The World
From A Monster With Poison Breath

It's the autumn mornings, the strange selection of dark in the sky with some light creeping onto, perhaps out of, the leaves, with the sense of everything's escaping, worry that the world may turn out to have no other latitude. When color leaves us in fragments of gray, we'll move about looking purposeful, wear red or purple on our sleeve, fling our bright earnest questing at the divinely lifeless sky. And then the dreams will come true, in a way, the grenade defused, the monster slain. People will stop dying without reason. We'll stand in a crowd of colorless reasons then, cheeks whitening, feet draining away, to check newscast retrospectives, see where, exactly, the moment of wrong occurred.
Pandora's Jukebox

It's the bedroom. Just the t.v. radiating blue and two people. What do we know about them? That they are ordinary and tired and sometimes fight, perhaps did recently, and the watching is desultory; and he points screenward, possibly joking; that's where the heartaches begin. She says then, ah, and where do they end? /This bud's for you exclamation point/ We'll be ending like this for was there a line written above this one? ever?

end without end, amen.

And someone rolled over and someone put out the light, and those heartaches they got loose like some figure for a god's spite and they leached into the room gilding all the furniture and staining it inside ten years twilight.

And the two are already asleep, probably; hear their deep marcato breaths pile like waves on the shore of the body, or is it the watchamacallit, the soul--

Sigh.

How romantic it all would be on disc, how unbearable.
I, Said the Sparrow, the Thrush, the Dove

From the day he stepped in my supper and left red footprints on the porch he was a trespasser, surviving skirmishes with a tattered left ear, an inflamed foot, a bullet somewhere in his chest cavity—coups counted on him in fights I never saw.
My grandmother said Kota is Low German for tomcat.

One day life shook itself and left him, but only in his own tenuous steps. All the apology he gave, a look up, surprising in its mildness, when his legs fumbled and folded beneath him. What was left?
To lie there and purr. Oh, but his tail was always his angriest self and it gaveled the table until all that black fur washed livid, until past the unaccustomed gentleness, until the years beside the horse pasture, the endless wrestling of species endlessly strange to each other had been lopped away, even as silently as he.

It was I, the reluctant deity, at ease with doctors, in the habit of bounty, who never intended this kindness, gave one day and took the rest. It was a choice of deaths. I couldn't let him die in English.
It must have been a premonition, the class, foreign words a salve, the grammar absorbing: meine Katze ist tote, meine Katze ist tote.

So the logged hillside was grateful to have you.
The blackness of the world drained in, then, to fill your shadow, and I see you now as much as I ever did, I see you approximately in pieces of shade and sheets clumsily quilted to the shape of sleep. This way I pilfer time to make you stand and pester me where you never could.
What is left? I know where you are,
that you no longer impersonate silence, the line that connects taking and giving.
Two Histories

I. Having come alive with sentience, an accidental distillation programmed for the enlightening error, we saw each other, saw ourselves thrumming through the phyla: grass to frog to bacterium, splitting and merging, connected without permission--

"Shared knowledge is true creation, always fragile, maintained by many desires, errors, jubilations, fears, unexpected losses, and sudden discoveries" So the world's stem was broken in the fall, someone lying about the tree's end; things lay here and there, waiting a conjunction, waiting a meeting of odds, the flash of blue light: humanity flushed from its primal hiding in a signal flare. Stories configured precise, mutable as equations, tumbled the centuries. And the sparks fly still, one bulky hemisphere stubborn to learn how creation began in the interstices.
II. In a fury of attention balanced like goldfish nibbling their reefed world, suspended viscous delicacy but not so languid, my patient lover, my cartographer, spell history from this eroded fossil record, our preterit selves: shallow seas, insects—thrashing gargoyles in amber.
What a plateau was bared to beneath purring, kneading weather: by turns desert and waves, every continent an Atlantis, and we too somehow there, encrustations, holding patterns for gray matter. And now a swash of gold, fantails raveled in the current, through open gills the pulse that drives a pinsliver wedge into time. An unequal task, to live, to contravene the unreeling spool, and then to exhale hopes that balloon like bubbles rising from sifting mouths of goldfish.
Accomplices

We live together in the basement.
In my room's before-bed quiet I can hear spiders' feet flailing at cardboard files, hunters angling for a way out of the lamp.
Next, to tap the desk, unrelenting pine, and on around, until some furniture shows its age and hospitality and opens to their knocking.
My bookcase is their haven against the storm of light unleashed on them in their unsuspecting prowls; I glimpse one's shimmer across the rug and know how in that thoughtless flutter my shudders walk the bedroom openly.

Is it myself that clothes them in witchcraft, my prattling, projectile fears that keep us both in thrall?
In darkness, then, my ear figures, elaborates, certain I hear a wolf spider lean back on three haunches lifting a fourth to scratch its own nonexistent ear.

Why does fear fox me with their skirting, that gallop doubled, each a matched pair in himself? I've never told myself, nor rendered it to fairness-- instead cringe and curry news from the dark, of the vicissitudes of that heartless, mindless skitter after the lamp's raw flash, snared in my own hulking torpor senseless to vibrations that serve them for sound, serve my careless demons, shareholders in this sketch of a cobweb titled life.

And, Aside,

I always liked the gesture drawings best, as if the image were still rumpled on the cranium when it splashed out of an eye, the pores, the leaking pen and hit the paper in an unsteady wave precisely akin to the real flickering subject, there the perimeter of the drawing-- a tuft of air and the mind's carving, a feast, a tentacled epigram and not maudlin, not false cherry color, but bitter black and white, not like the flamingoed world but a capture nonetheless.
II. Feats of Engineering Feats of Engineering; a memo to Cortazar straw hats casters

the jackknife (all forms) Easter eggs
some pottery snippets of:
  a) conversation
  b) dog hair
paper bags
town councils dream overbearing landlords garbage

In all what is this cleverness worth?
"if love is not to wind up as a pop song," come on, Julio, don't be dour because you know how it is, it's just an anxious cipher for a purer desire, you and we writing letters that stretch in to frisk people's guts
"Big Divot Baffles Officials"

A hole, six feet by ten feet, two feet deep in some Washington farmer's field; 75 feet away lies the sod plug, torn up, deposited neatly, if turned a few degrees. It weighs a ton, probably. No one we know has tried to lift it.

That's Washington. That's newspapers. Marvels to be had daily for the asking. Lucky the farmer--does he know?--Lucky his sons, who came across the marvel while chasing cattle. Lucky cattle! And lucky, lucky you, privileged reader, chocolate candy square poised at mouth's rim, read on. The baffled officials swear on affidavits. These things did not bring about the marvel: it was not the small earthquake, the slip and buckle in that area on 9 October; it was not a meteorite's impact. It was not--this is sworn testimony--the work of a giant cookie cutter. They do not know whose work it was,

and you, teacup in hand, though this marvel of everyday requires your attention--else why the affidavits, the bafflement, all that extraordinary luck?--you, nearly finished now, putting down the paper, you couldn't have done it without the cookie cutter, you needed it all, the divot, the earthquake, the meteor--as well as the unsworn guesses, the things only cattle may have seen:

The Chinese, burrowed through at last, twenty of them, a team, all dressed alike, lifted the sod like a manhole cover, looked at the cattle, looked at a field littered with glacial erratics, nobody home. Turned silently, and went back.
Operation

Oh, he was a fine surgeon, yes such a tidy one, and every day he made another neat incision and, almost finicky, you might say--wasn't he a good surgeon, though!--as delicately, as tenderly, sewed her up again, and so it went, the jigsaw apart and together, and between, new, thoughtful arrangements inside; such relentless cleverness, the dainty parting of flesh and revelation of proud buds of blood lined for their moment on the hoarse stage of the skin; and then, more painstaking than a tatting of cobweb lace, the stitches infinitesimal, so dedicated was he, so--eager, actually, for the process to begin again; and she supine, watching, immobile, each day almost unchanged.
Explanatory Note in the Dorian Mode

What I was groaning for in the seize and rupture of each stride was the torch, goats and their bleats rocketing away, scrabbling at the heights of dust, all pointing with the flame, scarcely visible, I pushed into Hyperion's reaches. I was alone, but clouds of burning gods and the huzzahs of men drunk on them were waiting somewhere green and olive-stippled.

And with each puff of smoke away I felt an eagle's shadow, and my liver writhed.

You'll find our race typically overdone, celebratory mostly to ourselves and you're right this far:
the men who fell by the sea, the sons of the strong-greaved Achaians, can be counted one by one like any others falling anywhere.

But understand,
I'd seen the bowls of Exekias the potter, that etching of Achilles and Ajax cocked over the gameboard coiled against their chairs, and those spears, the gods' own, careless against the near wall.

I'd stood molten myself when a priestess revolved in the haze of incense; all of us breathing in the evening rose and ochre, the gods' retort the lucent swirling riddles at Delphi.
Trevor in the World

He died holding a glass of sherry. Had big lips, tried on paintings like underwear, you could tell, looking at him pose in the gallery.

Bet he was one of those babies in a perambulator with a bulbous head and a place on the nose where the glasses would be

How did he vote? Later on, I mean, after the measles shots. Yes, that's the question, with his fondness for silk ties and fraudulent teeth

Bet he got knocked down at recess once or twice

Desiderata: glass doors at the office, a meerschaum at the club, pint of bitters at the pub, arms to wave-- and a little time at the beach, flannel skies spitting, fascination with the rocks and anguished spray, toddlers oblivious to his toes--

He wasn't such a great statesman, said the Times, just this guy, you know?
What the Crippled Said

We are the defective ones on all stuttering fours; the ache in the lumbar of the universe, we are;
in the speckled conscience of the world, its dreams greasy on our lips, we stand apostate, glassy surface of change indifferent to the din of our crooked stares.
We forage at the edge of self, riddled with the world like a stump with termite tunnels, the failed broadsides of genes at play and let us tell you, it's no joke, to imprison the world's mysteries, we tell you this, on our cracked honor.
News From the Front

The monkey tribe has settled down at last, and taken up farming, albeit in sometimes witless ways. They are so many together, though, and so easily charged with fury, that we remain in the forest, looking out from its welling rustle, powerless to save our gardens.

These loose-lipped howlers have made merry in our plots, yanking out shoots with tweezers, leveling the elegant raised beds. They track garbage into the house. They run the washing machine in endless cycles: it foams and churns while they watch, jumping up and down, hooting, and we are powerless.

From the trees, between the green spaces for breath, we might have snuck in to snip the wires, silenced our housebound toasters, music boxes, but at a risk, and--perhaps the apes will electrocute themselves. We are waiting, in this forest exploding with vines, to see. We've taken nothing with us; it screams with its own high voltage.
Memsahib Gathers Flowers at the Well And Retires from Empire with Grace

The children cricket-thin, reddish because we lack a rain to settle the dust and the letters from Bristol all stout cheer again

I'm growing indulgent, I fear, let the housegirls exchange the frocks I sewed myself, or nearly, for a wilderness of saris I don't understand, can't understand the feverish designs their wanton temple friezes, the riot in one elephant's tusk it all makes my head turn a little to fan this breeze, dear that cloud of rickety children like gnats on the far bank My hat arrived last month and already impossibly curled along the edges. Thank God--thank God for something. Braid these stems nicely for me, Rosalie--

Why not the blessed rain, why no satiety, ever and our lights only keep it at bay

Funny the afternoons go corrugated, spotted the heat affects time too so that the far bank and 4 o'clock mind tea's ready sharp at four, and some letters, from Bristol perhaps,
--or the interior--
Cynic Being That Romantic Who Knows Better,

I remember when Marsha asked me, is Ellen cynical? And I said, yes. Marsha laughed, she'd have to be, living with you, wouldn't she? And I said, yes. And later I was thinking of this and of how you and I once spent the sun lavishly taking the Fiesta up gutted mountain roads, whinnying and gasping over that most desirable campsite, the one at the eaves of the range, capped by blinding air shredded with sunlight and insurmountable? We never found it; were never uncertain of it, that it was there.

--for Ellen Voth
The Tree Needs Only Wind To Sing

Not slick. These Czech musicians aren't slick. It's all still an experiment to them. The band isn't tight, they haven't heard of drum machines.

Capitalists, not even fit for recycling, says the politburo. No one is served, these creatures treat the gallows like a musical instrument, they can't sing, they can't even sing.

Febrile dreams, demons, says the band, "but careful thought won't harm even a chicken," and they plan a show: What it means to lead a horse.

Some locals get through the barriers; the police are there too, not to dance this time, nor to give musical advice. Nor consent: Call this a concert? not even one love song, and entirely too much passion. Modulation is the great deceiver, children, cross yourselves and avert the evil eye-- gentlemen, may we show you the border?

The band has kept an exit clear. They salvage an electric piano, wood blocks, commit halting melodies to vinyl in an old farmhouse, intonation still imperfect but the woodwinds' kaddish for Mandelstam equal parts sonorous and wavering hangs a long breath longer in their forests, silence and blackness older than regimes.

The record is pressed in Canada, available in the U.S. by mail order. I stumble in dark forests over Slavic modes, throatlocked consonants unclaimed by those other tautly tuned ears.
Lullaby to the nth

Pigs, frogs, other things with wings ants in the pudding red livestock on a green field, rampant Huzzah, huzzah!

With musk falling the outlines sink and all's away--air so porous here, custom got caught in the updraft tea's gone, the trees have sucked in the daylight, no more, no more, we're all nocturnal now, blotters for night and its heavy air; we lurch to the rhythms of the millennia like sunk cargo. Among owls in the woods' ribs, born into their own strangeness, toddlers, leggy storklets, dragonfly nymphs: the babies of the world caper beribboned.
Woman at the Lunch Counter

When Effie sits at a table with her coffee cup, our focal point, I have trouble keeping the rest of her clear.
I think it is a mutual thing.
She won't pin her eyes on all of me, reaching with effort for the cup, as if her air were more viscous than mine.
And eyes conspicuously wide, neurons smoking at the junctions, smile gripped in a pair of incisors, she's a case of brittle delight over the shower she's planned, the one for some young woman she doesn't know, who's pregnant by Effie's husband; over her birthday coming some day soon, a fancy coat she asked for—we waitresses look at each other—I offer her more coffee. There is always more, and she always wants it.
Blind parable

Sammy done twice the wrong it was possible to do.

(Voice 1: Well, that takes the wind out of my spiritual sails. Voice 2: Quick, give the muse a breath mint and never mind reading him his rights.)

They waltzed all around the rigging and out onto the gangplank before anyone knew:

- vertigo in high and public places
- "guilty of" bang bang
- can't bang
- dang judge's gavel
- bang
- "in high and public seas."

(He was still smiling, that lumberjack that wisecrack that nocount diseased dog)

Voice 1: So here we are becalmed, positively metameric, and he's out there on the mizzenmast, the poop deck, larking about, blowing bubbles-- Voice 2: ...and no, I don't want...palely... Muse: Hhhaaaorr (And everyone blew over.)

Now Sammy got tangled up in the sailcloth. Strange things kept falling from the muse's mouth and wings and she really did have halitosis

He played the waltz and danced it too all at once and the muse was jitterbugging around, clodhopping, lariat-tossing

- yee haw!
- statues and totems sprang up hugely
- the mast sprouted a carillon
- it was a madcap wind, jingoed timing
- nothing abated: Now look what you've done,
- in a rising peal of anguish they were begging him tell her a joke, put her in the hatch and oh the stench what happens when your ship comes in?
but she wouldn't fit, the ship skittered and bucked

(stanza break)
So now she's really loose Sammy, in these high and public times, and no matter how ruddy and giddy, there's always a twinge even in gale, full force, with all the world rushing by you reel a little gulp, and the air's a bit nauseous you're telescoping in and out to keep pace

Still.
Still, it was that or becalmed.
Thanksgiving

After the carving we boiled ligaments, skin, rib cage rising from the swamp of its marrow.

Fifteen pounds, and who'd have thought
we did it for the bones:

from the stock I took a few of them to translate their voiceless glyphs.

Scrubbing beneath the cartilage, emptying the hollows with a pin, the bones bared at last:

on inspection they proved too intricate,
too simple;

those smaller, taken from the back, I set aside for earrings-- I might hear it, a translucent message clean as a dead man's palm, the lifeline fled.

--for Karen Reimer
III. Keeping the Faith
When the Time Comes

Part of the town is reticent most of the year, smells of oil and gas, but comes to the fore here in the grinding summer when trucks slough in from fields anywhere far. Brought to queue on Main Street highway through the slanting evenings, they leave every concrete crack overcome with kernels and chaff. In three days this year the wheat turned; I follow a green bowl of a bullfrog sliding belly-down on ditch grass in his foppish haste, after rain.

Even the endless wind feels weary just now, sweeping this part of the town out from under the inadvertent wheat. Harvest spooks pigeons from the elevator towers again and again, and farmers rise at 4 a.m., move like ghosts to their dusty machinery, don't kill engines until the next dark. I think of springing up to bear burdens; I think of early peepers' nightly calls, each new weather an urgent rumor.
The Bass Creek Commune

The deer have forgotten, no longer nuzzle the soggy newspapers on the floor.
We come upon the valley in snowmelt, in twilight peer at the burnished undersides of clouds, a giant, rusty can of pepper, the charred remains of a sauna, animal droppings; trace the erasing terraces, a moat of broken glass on every side and the blankly octagonal, puzzled windows.

Part of the structure itself, solid, still insulated, black gaps where the solar cells were sunbared, imposes itself on the southerly updraft with singleminded patience, but is confused, its northern half pulling away uphill, resentful, as beetles will drag crushed bodies after them: the labor of retirement, the geese a season away, and deer coalescing on sudden feet, apprehensive, their ears scalded by an acrid cry, infinitiesimal settlement of dust.

Half a Year of Dawn

The ankles of caribou click force time to focus into an instant and tick it away as quickly-- is that a tableau there, or an action shot? The caribou are claim adjustors, eaters and eaten keeping the faith, and they stop for a word with the rivers, giving up to the wolves, the balls of cysts in their lungs, parcelling out what is not gratuity Jazz Steps for Renunciation

Cedar waxwings, the most dapper of winter visitors—catch those flashy shades, the oil-bright wingtips and tails' edge.
And their gigs in sudden flocks—they emerge in a tree and it springs twittering leaves. Their calls the wind torn on signalling bills. It's the flocks of waxwings that pull the weather in slim harness, slim as a fact, over the mountains, into this smoky valley.
Their going, twitters and leaves winked apart and together again, draws the weather along.
Their spiral heavenward draws a blank.
On the Translation of Species

Black and white, suspended in the dilute sky, swallow-tailed kites, trim falcons, survey their Everglades nests and come down when they will. Sensitive and stubborn.
Catch one and he'll outwait you, die intransigent, without asking.
They wouldn't trifle with civilization either, and so their range diminished as centuries and people clattered by, until the swamps enclosed raptors who'd once flown freely across the south and plains.
Their less fussy, drab cousins, Mississippi kites, increased where swallow-tails could not,
across the prairies of the midwest, across the Kansas flinthills. But the swallow-tails, could they remember that windswept sky?
Held and hung there in some memory's vestige, watching wind shake tallgrass prairies in chains of light, grasshopper feet trampling sod to dust...

Jim Parker knew enough to see the rest.
Anxious for press in Audubon and obsessed to recreate the new world, and reestablish swallow-tailed kites, he used an old deception to tease Mississippis into raising the Floridans as their own: it was his reclamation to smuggle in young swallow-tails from Florida and trick their homeland into readoption.
For this he slogged the glades, shimmied its tallest trees, and snatched four dusters of newly-hatched, dirty gray anger, the parents helpless, beating the air above.
A chartered jet flew the chicks precociously two time zones and one harsh climate west.
In Kansas Parker raided porch eaves for starling chicks to feed his nervous, growing swallow-tails. One survived, the plains' newest immigrant, and an emissary from the past. Parker named her Nordica, invoking a century gone, a singer from Maine who'd fled to Europe to return the opera to its native realm.

(stanza break)
The fledgling kite was like any hawk's child, the color of pussy willows, with a greedy beak, and gorged on self-importance. They eat to live, and don't forget it. Nordica didn't know how strange she was as the black primaries grew, pinned her to a new sunlapped state. Staid slate Mississippis, the functional midwesterners, looked askance. They hung above the town all day, flung down soprano daggered cries, kittering wails the starlings imitated lewdly and sniggered at in numbers.

Parker watched Nordica off in fall, migrant to south of Mexico. A story of a flashy pilgrim, trailing black streamers, filtered in from New Mexico: it flew with other falcons, so many flakes of soot escort to a roughened, anxious vapor. But the source was uncertain. Who admitted seeing the swamp-born stranger fly across the Arkansas river--where was a witness to hail Nordica if she shocked into the Guatemalan sky one morning, early in the brazen tropic winter?

There was another report: in western Kansas people don't distinguish much the birds of prey. Every year some are shot. Nordica had downy memories to lure her into farmers' fields. The spoor of the news grew cold, the sheriff reluctant to raise hackles with requests for carcass or identification. No one knew, in the end, who, if anyone, lied.
Dipped in the World, Keeping the Faith

1 Fighting sleep these nights a taste for lateness on the radio I listen, nod, reading about a winter wolf kill: the moose's blood spangled trees around and froze, spendthrift at the last, strange tinsel witness to an old eucharist.

2
A slow explosion of sun, and time commences;
the woods and I exhale.
A moth with frayed wingtips lands on my arm then crawls to the crumpled trenches of my jacket and jeans.
And so I carry his shadow nudging unlit folds with care. The delicacy of the dark's things.
House Call at Low Tide

Before you go, before you go see what the borer mussel left at the end of its tunnel in this fistful of basalt—only the tip of a world can be seen: his twin pearl wings make a high airy chatter inside the rock's sudden mouth-- their puckered chimes release a wash, convulsion and swallow left by the most soft sand's heart ever to invade the earth's cast iron.
Before melting in salt it was a round word: payment for Charon tangled in kelp before the sea's throatlatch unhinged and gulped down its children. And for us these leavings:
a wishbone of lime rattling improbably in a skull of stone.
Thoughts Run Like Weasel Tracks

Fox and deer met on a mountain; it was snowing and they had chosen the same bush.

I am standing beside the cabin splitting rounds.
I am standing beside the stove, the window there goes Peggy on skis snow so hard can't see across this valley her dog rocking in, across the snow ptarmigan in the willows?

Irish reels played on a violin.

Deer brown eyes, do they know whiteout?
Think of the red tail, a bush, livid in snow:

I saw coyote tracks meandering and you, meandering, saw the coyote.

On a mountain, fox and deer; it was snowing and they had chosen the same bush.

--for billy barr
Frogs Answer Spring

A dog barks and barks: dry heaves.
Thin plaints of chickadees—cat winks, sniffs the sun's twin in his eye. I record our complicity.
What are we straining our lungs for?
The meaning of a need—across the wetlands' tufts, from swollen bruises made of bubbles and mud, the season's processional sounds, in dirty water in ditches a thousand thousand requiems.