Summer 2008

Air Parts

Leila Wilson
LEILA WILSON

Air Parts

I

Whenever weight
shifts, a hollow
rouses in its pith.

Egg’s air. Door
hinge oiling for rain.
Her hush as the truck jolts.

All mass enfolds
gaps. All wind
and fury when a tree
litters light through her window screen.

She wants to know
how she’ll go down
unraveling.

II

There’s nothing
hallowed
in a ferry’s quake

before it slips
toward sinking.
Full of its last
owned move,
it will be a hole in the bay.

It will hold air
and bleed perforations.
After bedding,

it will be pilfered
by those who want
emptiness to touch.

III

Outlined by shadow
or echo or that which happens after,

mosquitoes trace
her with tremble.
Her hand holds

off rain, a herd
beyond the hill.
Her swallow’s

salamander grove
skids in thin wind.
How her voice scratches

from calling names,
how her neck strains
past straightening.
Because the sky can’t fill all in, and ceremony comes nowhere near, she looks for something else to pull her pulse. Balconied gasp. Bubble riding the river’s leg. Cracks. Lesions. Mesh. She traps the inside until it cores there. She mills the middle stillness.