At the Museum of the Civil War Soldier

Michael Peterson
At the Museum of the Civil War Soldier

Now closed.
The eye become a globe.
The lid becomes the splinter by its flight and all the head rehearsing our last summer, ringing.
Now closed, locked down earthworks shake by my direction.

I mould and prime
I right myself toward abatis, I fidget in my uniform and justify the time of travel, wind and send and arc and interstate to you,
unraveling housebound by a river.

The last evergreens shiver as if to mean the last momentary bareness of a moment meaning —
a tourist en route, on selfless course outside the bounds and kept year by year from union, I must believe

a copse will be cleaned from canopy to ground, all things will clear by register of round of my eye, bore through muzzle.