Before the Tribulations

Greg Wrenn
Before the Tribulations

You can't breathe our air, a tasteless, invisible mix, so you wear a pressurized suit, a helmet like a fishbowl over your head. For once your beard's combed and trimmed; your greenish-gray eyes reflect

the sky like wet sand after a wave recedes.
You've come back for me after two millennia, the Fifth and Sixth Crusades, a plague that hardly kept me chaste, so I can escape the hour, the centuries of trial.

I'm frustrated,
I can't kiss you, I can't bring any books, my gloomy

gratitude giving me the shivers. "This world," you mouth, "is just a dream." I'll never smell a forest again.

Never feel a lemur's nose. What's the use of running from calamity? (So many silently, loudly in pain.)
We gotta go soon, you say in your muffled telepathy.
I rush to mist my succulents, murmur babytalk to them.
Lock my dirty cell.
Shake out my welcome mat.

I run to grip your glove—