Women's Big Sky Tournament

Lauren Cooper and the Lady Griz set their sights on reclaiming the Big Sky title

Eyes on the Prize

LAUREN COOPER DIDN'T BECOME A BASKETBALL SENSATION OVERNIGHT.
HER JOURNEY HAD ITS UPS AND DOWNS AND ALONG THE WAY, A FEW THINGS HAPPENED THAT EVEN SHE NEVER DREADED OF.

By Matt Thompson

"O
K, Lauren, here’s the situation. There’s three seconds to go, the game is tied up and you’re on the line," he says as he hands his little girl the ball. She takes it, bounces it a few times on the cement and looks back for approval. “Listen, you have to remember this is a free basket — you have to concentrate and make it. If you focus and block out everything you will make it," he barks as he claps his hands three times to give her daughter encouragement.

She takes a few dribbles again, steadies the over-sized basketball in front of her and narrows her eyes, giving every ounce of concentration she has. She let’s it go and the ball tumbles into the sky with an awkward arc. But as it falls back toward earth, it somehow finds its way through the rusty orange rim and slips through the half-torn netting. He lifts his hands and runs over to give her a hug as the sun finally elides behind the distant hills and never-ending pastures of the Willamette Valley. Another basketball-filled summer day gone. She looks up and gives him a smile that would melt the heart of the devil himself. Then she gives him a little wink. That’s her girl.

Scottie Cooper could see it in her daughter back when she was an eighth grad-sisters. Ryan, the oldest daughter, was a very talented athlete in high school and the youngest, Katie, was a high school phenom as well. Still, something separated Lauren.

“Lauren was always able to take the criticism,” Scottie says. “We always had a special relationship.”

While the other girls became interested in other areas, Lauren became Scottie’s project. Sometimes she would be stuck in the rain, trying to master obscure, difficult drills. The next day it was practicing free throws. But Scottie made sure to back off and not drive his prodigy into a rebellious rage.

“We played a lot of one on one,” Lauren says. “But I laugh too much when I play with him. He cheats — grab my shirt and I’ll just be giggling the whole time. But I think from him pushing me all along I just went along with it. It just kind of all developed and I think it was just more of a path that I was walking on.”

That path led her to Montana, where UM coach Bob Raveling welcomed her onto the Lady Griz. The slender 6-foot guard immediately made her presence known by scoring double figures nine times and becoming the team’s fourth-leading scorer. She also grabbed Freshman of the Year honors. You could hear the whispers floating in the air — could she be as good as Greta Koss or even Shannon Cate someday?

“People are intimidated by her,” says teammate and friend Linda Weyler. “On the court she has this powerful image that is hard to ignore. It’s just how she carries herself.”

They knew Lauren was on her way. And so did she. In the 1997-98 season, Lauren struck with a vengeance, starting all 30 games and averaging 11.4 points a contest. She all but silenced any critics and scolded at the notion of a sophomore jinx. Again, Lauren’s stock rose as she was named to the first team All-Big Sky.

But as quick as a lawyer’s rebuttal, things would change for her. That following summer, chronic pain in her foot was beginning to wear on her. First diagnosed as a stress fracture, she found out the pain stemmed from an abnormal bone, which had developed from overuse. Lauren decided to have surgery, but it didn’t guarantee that the pain would go away.

The surgery was successful, but things got worse. While Lauren sat on the sidelines in a cast, the Lady Griz experienced their worst season in 19 years. She felt out of place. How could she help from the bench? For Lauren, it meant redirecting her focus somewhere else.

She withdrew. She decided to tackle her rehab head on, just like she would anything else, and forget the lost season.

But it was hard. And it was with the greatest of luck that her sister, Ryan, decided to move to Missoula. Ryan would cook, clean, drive Lauren to classes and just talk her through the rough times.

“She liked being babied, but it was great,” Ryan says. “It was really annoying at first because I had to take care of her all the time. Getting out of the car, she would throw the house keys to me and twice she threw them on the roof, so I had to go up and get them.”

In the process of making her comeback, Lauren and Ryan became friends, something that had eluded them in previous years.

“She was so incredible,” Lauren says. “It’s been awesome getting to know her. When I was in high school she was away so we never got the chance to get to know each other. She’s more of a friend than a sister. Lauren made it through rehab and late that spring she was back on the court, practicing her dribbling drills and perfecting her free throws.

That spring she got another surprise when she met UM transfer quarterback Drew Miller. The two started dating and the summer were engaged. As athletes in the spotlight, Lauren and Miller have become one of Missoula’s most recognizable couples, with almost a pseudo-celebrity status. She says she and Lauren helped through the aches and pains of being the center of attention as the Grizzlies made a run for the National Championship last fall.

“It’s kind of an escape,” Miller says. “I can just come home and eat dinner and not talk about football for a few hours or not talk about the injuries. That was sometimes the best part, just talking with her.”

“Just drives me and strengthens me,” Lauren says.

right in the world. As fans and readers, it's sports we end up looking to for inspiration on a we had as kids while dribbling a basketball in our parents' driveway weren't really as far away as they seemed back then.

We want to know about the crafty old coach, dead set on doing things the right way, still throwing sunset forever.

It's no secret really; we just like heroes bet-

Lady Griz back as top seed

This is all old hat for the Lady Griz, really. Montana, which won its ninth Big Sky title in the last 11 years in the regular season, is once again where they are tougher than a two-year old piece of beef jerky. The Lady Griz haven’t lost to a Big Sky opponent in Dahlberg since Feb. 27, 1992. Since then, Montana has been perfect, going 63-0 against their league foes.

And nothing has changed this year. Montana (13-3, 7-2) is undefeated at home in conference play and has been perfect, going 12-2 points and 7.6 rebounds a game this season. Her numbers may be down from last year (when she averaged 20.7 ppg), but Weyler was a dominant leader on a Grizzly team that had the largest average margin of victory in the conference, beating their opponents by 12.8 points. Weyler also had to make way for junior Lauren Cooper, who sat out last season, but came back this year to earn first-team All-Big Sky honors.

Cooper was fourth in the league in scoring, averaging 13.9 points per game. Weyler and Cooper are just a part of the physical frontline Montana possess.

The other Grizzly to watch out for in the tournament is forward Krista Redpath. The 6-1 senior from Great Falls, Mont., lit up last week against Eastern Washington with a career high 29 points. Her sweet left hook and shot-blocking ability have given teams fits all season.

UM also boasts one of the deepest benches in the conference. Sophomore Sinnamon Schildt, who was named the Big Sky’s top Sixth Man, adds rebounding and consistency. Senior point guard Meggan Thompson gives opposing teams a one-two punch when she relieves Megan Harrington. Laura Valley, UM’s 6-3 center, is eighth in the league in blocked shots. True freshman Julie Demming rounds out a bench that has been productive all year.

Despite their untarnished home record, the Lady Griz did have their troubles on the road at times this year. Most notably, UM dropped two road games three weeks ago to Cal State-Northridge, the tournament’s No. 2 seed, and NAU, who fell to Weber State on Wednesday in the first round.

Much of Montana’s success can be attributed to their gritty defense. UM ranks second in the nation in field goal percentage defense and fifth in points allowed per game with 53.1. Harrington leads the team and is fourth in the league in steals, averaging almost two a game.

Idaho State led by Dillon, Mont. star

It’s been a sweet homecoming for Idaho State forward Mandi Carver so far.

In the Bengals’ win over Eastern Washington in the first round of the women’s Big Sky basketball tournament, Carver grabbed 18 rebounds, which broke the Big Sky single-season rebounding record of 366, and led ISU to its first win in the conference tournament in school history.

Carver, a 6-foot-2 sophomore from Dillon, Mont., was recruited neither by Montana nor Montana State in high school. An NCAA berth would probably provide a measure of redemption, but Carver denies any feelings of resentment.

“I’m just here to help our team win this tournament,” Carver said.

Carver is also among the Big Sky leaders scoring at 14.4 per game and blocked shots, averaging 1.78 per contest. Idaho State is also led by point guard Angela Mangar. The 5-9 senior from Hawthorne, Nev., leads the league in steals (2.5 ppg) and assists (5.6).

Also look for shooter Chris Urbanski, who averaged 11.3 points per game and was second in the Big Sky in three-pointers with 2.4 per game.

ISU split with No. 2 seeded Cal State-Northridge, this year, but dropped both contests with tournament host Montana. ISU coach Ardie McInerney finally got her first win in Dahlberg Arena on Wednesday, but has yet to beat the Grizzlies in her four-year career in Pocatello, Idaho.

The Bengals have been a particularly hot team of late, winning nine out of their last 11 games.

“We’ve been here twice before as the higher seed and lost,” Mangar said. “So it was nice to come in here and win.”

—Matt Thompson
If there is a team that Montana does not match up well with it is the Weber State Wildcats. Led by a group of quick and feisty competitors, the Wildcats (13-14, 10-6) may be the women’s version of Arkansas’ heralded “40 minutes of hell.”

Highly sophisticated plays from their head coach Carla Taylor, “We’re two deep at every position so we can concentrate on pressuring and defense.”

The Wildcats used their relentless defense to speak to Northern Arizona in the first round of the women’s Big Sky tournament, 62-49. Trailing for almost the entire game and down by six with under a minute remaining, Weber made a torrid comeback. After two steals and a five-second call, WSU Weber made a torrid comeback. After six with under a minute remaining, the defense to squeak by Northern Arizona almost the entire game and down by four points with the Grizzlies, 65-60. In the first round of the women’s Big Sky Conference title under their belts.

But defending their title is not weighing heavily on head coach Frozeno Jerro’s mind. “At this point, it is do or die for everybody, so we are taking it one game at a time,” Jerro said. “We haven’t really thought that much about the title. When you’ve got as much to worry about as we do, you’ve got to take one thing at a time.”

The Matadors were one of the three teams that defeated the Lady Griz this season, when they trounced UM 49-67. The Matadors have the personnel to outlast Montana’s tough zone defense with a barrage of threes to make the bigger Grizzlies play man to man and get caught up in WSU’s half-court style of play.

"He definitely gives me perspective when I'm down. The escape is definitely a good thing."

Lauren and Miller may be a happy couple, but sometimes their competitiveness comes out. Lauren says she can beat Miller in one on one basketball, something he doesn't like to admit. Miller, for his part, says he can whoop Lauren in tennis, something she hates to admit.

Instead of becoming soft and preoccupied with the romance of her engagement, Lauren has become relaxed and focused. This season Lauren has made a big comeback.

"She used to just be able to shoot the three, but now she can dribble, post up or do anything else you ask her," Weyler says.

Lauren seems focused on making the NCAA tournament. She'll play it off and reluctantly tell you that her basketball career is nothing big. But if you look closer, you can see it in those soft green eyes of hers. The determination and tenacity is there. But the one who can see it best is Scottie, who still keeps in contact through e-mail every day.

Perhaps he saw it earlier this season at the championship game of the Lady Griz Holiday Classic.

"I had noticed that she was a bit off on her free throws so we talked about going back to the basics," Scottie says.

Late in the game, trailing 53-51, teammate Linda Weyler was fouled by Pacific's Millie Klimpton with 19 seconds remaining. Hearing the call, the Pacific bench erupted and drew a technical foul. Weyler made one of two foul shots to pull Montana within one. Lauren was now on the line to shoot the technical shots.

As she stepped up to the line, the crowd noise turned into a hush. She closed her eyes and could suddenly smell the wet pastures of Corvallis again. She took a few dribbles and then glanced up at the crowd and found her father.

This is a free basket, you have to concentrate. Remember, block everything out and you will make it.

She steadied herself, let the ball sit lightly upon her hand and sweetly released it into the air. The arc was perfect, as though it was sliding along a rainbow. The ball floated through the net, barely making a sound. Lauren took the ball again, released it with a confident, fluid motion and the ball sank magnificently. The Lady Griz won 54-53.

He jumped from his seat and that moment he felt as if he could soar over the ten rows in front of him to give his daughter a hug. She nonchalantly stepped off the line, found his smile in the crowd and winked.

That's his girl.
25 reasons why you've gotta love Grizzly basketball

13. The Den. Students were moved to the end of the court for the flat cots with fatter mattresses in the Big Sky dust to put together a sex cheering effort. Extra points here because Matt Williams thought up the name.

14. Shane Christensen's hustle. When it comes to talking Christensen, Holst rewrites the book on metaphor and simile. So far this season we've heard the Holster quip that his little point guard "weighs about as much as a chicken" and probably "couldn't bench press a pretzel." That's fine with us as long as Scooter keeps dishing passes to Matt Williams and keeps bombing clutch triples whenever the Griz need a spark.

15. Dominique Davis' power moves. Last season isn't something we like to talk too much about. Sentinel Gym was about as budget as Division I college basketball can get. But one upside to the high school facility was that every Dominique Braswell makes you feel the door while the refs attempt to straighten the rims. This season, at least once a game, Davis has come up with a block so huge it leaves us holding our hats.

16. Larry Krystowski. How does that saying go? Legends never die, they just become assistant coaches? Well anyway, we've still never forgiven Bill Laimbeer for that cowardly cheap shot that took out Krywoz when he was a preseason NCAA tournament semifinalist with the Milwaukee Bucks. But learning Montana's greatest ever player into a journeyman eventually brought him back to Missoula, where he's been the Obi Wan Kenobi to Matt Williams' Luke Skywalker. Guess that would make The No-Show, MVP-stealing Harold Arceneaux Darth Vader. We'll remember how that one turned out, right?

17. "Who is the world is Travis Greenland?" Only one of the biggest clutch players in the Milwaukee Brewers' lineup that's who. People might have wondered who the seldom-used 6-6 forward was at the beginning of the year, but not at the end. You want to keep a rebound alive? Thrown down a tough put back in traffic? Travis is the guy. Everyone so excited to have the tourney here should be sure to thank Travis before they get carried away. They don't come any bigger than his 16 points, eight rebounds and key block late in the clincher against Eastern Washington. Sorry Eastern, but we're talking about in-your-face man-to-man defense.

18. ESPN 2. Just when you thought ESPN would be the first to tell you, without these guys, UM wouldn't have come nearly this far.

20. Colleen Marks, basketball secretary. When your car is running great, you never stop to appreciate how hard your engine is working to make sure the outside looks and performs good. Simply put, that's Colleen Marks. One of the nicest people on campus, she'd track down a coach in the Bob Marshall Wilderness if the Kaimin convinced her it was important enough. And you know what? Usually we're just asking for a goofy picture of the team holding up coach Holst during practice. Somehow, our absurd demands don't seem so absurd to her. For that, props go out.

21. Dan Carter's "Cadillac Work." Before DC arrived on campus, Holst told us he "looked like a 57 Chevy, but did Cadillac work." How true. Carter's been a big help for the Griz off the bench this season by just being solid all the way around. Here's hoping that inflated gas prices won't slow the Griz down under Holst's tenure.

22. The Future. Card. Cummings. Lynch. Stuart. Williams. Pederson. Milosaljevic. Are some of these guys stars in the making? You bet. Mike Card can jump like a kangaroo and Cummings can fill it up on the score-board. But even more honorable, some of these guys sweat buckets every day in practice for little more than a jersey and a few seconds of playing time. You can judge a program by how well it treats its players who play the least. Holst would be the first to tell you, without these guys, UM wouldn't have come nearly this far.

23. Kyle Keyes. The truth of it? Kyle can flat out ball. Injuries have kept him from showing the Garden City, but you better believe next year his star will get its chance to shine.

24. Blaine Taylor. Mike Montgomery. It's gonna be a showdown. Let's fast-forward a week and pretend the Grizzlies have already captured the Big Sky's NCAA berth. Now, let's also assume that to skim on travel costs those thrifty galoots at the NC-2-A decide to put Montana in the West Regional in Salt Lake. If everything works perfectly (and things in Grizzly sports almost always do) we could be looking down the barrel of a match-up with the highly-seeded St. John's Cardinals. We know we don't have to explain those implications. Can you say "local sports writer's fantasy?" Holst vs. Blaine Taylor/Mike Montgomery. We've said it before and will say it again: you never stop to appreciate how hard your engine is working to make sure the outside looks and performs good. Simply put, that's Colleen Marks. One of the nicest people on campus, she'd track down a coach in the Bob Marshall Wilderness if the Kaimin convinced her it was important enough. And you know what? Usually we're just asking for a goofy picture of the team holding up coach Holst during practice. Somehow, our absurd demands don't seem so absurd to her. For that, props go out.

25. Because when it comes to Montana basketball, anything can and will happen.
Northern Arizona head coach Mike Adras said that the Big Sky tournament is about seniors.

"I am a big believer in this, it's their last time," Adras said. Good thing for Adras, since he has three of the better seniors in the conference in Billy Hix, Dan McClintock and Ross Land. The trio combined for 50 points in NAU's first round victory over Portland State.

Because of this experience, NAU was picked to finish in the top of the Big Sky but struggled early losing their first four conference games of the season. The Jacks, however, got hot and reeled off 11 straight victories before losing to Weber State and subsequently ending any championship hopes. But don't count NAU's seniors out.

Billy Hix (6.7 ppg, 5.5 rpg) is a gutsy defender who passes and rebounds well and can shoot the three. While he is NAU's best post defender, Hix is more than capable of getting 10-15 points per game.

The inside-outside duo of Ross Land and Dan McClintock is one of the most dangerous in the conference.

Land (16.4 ppg, 41 percent from behind the arch) is the all-time Big Sky career three-point field goal leader and is NAU's go-to-guy. Don't let his California mop-top fool you, Land is a serious player with serious skills.

The 7-foot McClintock (15.6 ppg, 6.6 rpg) is one of the most dominant post players in the conference. He has surprising touch for a big man. Both he and Land were first team all-conference Big Sky members.

NAU must make the three-point shot to be effective. The Jacks launched 577 three-balls on the season and making threes is important to open up McClintock down low. Besides Hix and Land, junior Cory Schwab and sophomore Adam Lopez can also bomb from deep.
Eagles could be the best team you've never heard of

When you look at Eastern Washington, you don't see a team of stars. There's no Matt Williams. There's no Eddie Gill or Harold Areneaux. But what matters most in basketball is how well the team does — and the Eagles know how to win.

Eastern Washington was stop the Big Sky conference heading into the final game of the season, before losing to Montana at home 77-75. Eastern, seeded second in the conference tournament, will take a 1:2 conference record into Friday night's game against Northern Arizona. "We don't do anything super, but we do everything well," said head coach Steve Aggers.

Senior guard Ryan Hansen was awarded a spot on the All-Big Sky team, along with Williams. The 12.6 scoring average was good enough to lead the Eagles. Center Chris White gives the Eagles a presence down low, averaging 9.7 points a game, as well as being fourth in the conference in rebounding.

Joining White in the starting lineup, some key reserves off the bench include guard Jamal Jones and forwards Will Levy and Dennis Fitzgerald. Fitzgerald lit up for 17 points against NAU this season. "Since Christmas break we've played very hard and played very well together," Aggers said. "Very unselfish play with great chemistry."

The sum of the group is greater than its parts." And their stats show the team effort. The Eagles lead the conference in scoring margin, defeating their opponents by six points a game. And the Eagles know how to shoot the ball from behind the arc, averaging a conference-best nine three-pointers a game.

Eastern Washington and NAU match up extremely closely. The teams split the games during the regular season, each team winning at home. The key to the game may be containing NAU forward Ross Land, who scored 26 and 25 points in the two games versus Eastern.

Tip-off for the game is 7:05 p.m.

Eastern and Cal State-Northridge are the only teams remaining in the tournament that have never made an appearance in the NCAA tournament. In fact, the Eagles have only one victory in four Big Sky tournament appearances.

—Casey Temple
Road to redemption leads home for Montana

The Grizzlies are looking a little more like Rodney Dangerfield every day. Everybody treats them with "no respect."

UM, 12-14, exceeded every­one's expectations and won its share of the regular season Big Sky title along with Eastern Washington.

But head coach Don Holst has said that the recent snub of Matt Williams (19.0 ppg, 10.3 rpg) as conference MVP and the absence of Mike Warhank (13.8 ppg, 84 percent FT) on the all-conference Eastern Washington.

Big Sky title along with one's expectations and won its share of the regular season—Ryan Divish

Meetings with the Matadors non-stop physical pressure. The Grizzly to win, Buckmaster and his trademark knee high socks will have to exploit Northridge from downtown. Northridge's athleticism presents match-up problems defensively; senior forwards

Andre Larry and Jeff Parris have given UM problems in the past. The duo has scored an average of 31 points in the two games versus the Griz.

Holst has said that besides turnovers, Northridge's defense wears teams down physically as well as disrupting offense sets. The Griz will look to control tempo, take care of the ball and get Williams to the free throw line, where he has scored 143 points this season — and while they're at it, perhaps pick up a little respect.

—Ryan Divish
reasons why you’ve gotta love Grizzly basketball

(As if you needed any)

BY KEVIN VAN VALKENBURG AND CHAD DUNDAS

1. Don Holst. Do we really need to spell it out for you?

2. Matt Williams. Here’s a memo to the fools who passed on Matt as Big Sky MVP. 19.2 points per game, 11.3 rebounds per game, 13 double-doubles, our leading scorer 10 times this season. What did you want from this kid? How about a 3.6 average in math and physics? We have to wonder what Harold Arceneaux’s GPA is like in that strenuous “Technical Sales” major he’s declared. But all kidding aside, Matt’s a stand-up guy both on and off the floor, highly deserving of accolades. For bringing the pain in the lane all season and always saying “hi” when we see him on campus, Matt gets our (albeit unofficial) MVP vote.

3. Ryan Slider’s dunks. “It happened Nov. 23 when the Griz were playing Montana Tech. Forward Dan Carter chucked an alley-oop from half court that veered a full Chevy pickup’s length wide of the basket. Number 34 was already in the air when Carter’s lob came sailing in, looking like it might land in a Sugar Bear’s lap. But Ryan Slider levitated like an Apollo astronaut and spread his arms wider than an albatross’ wings. Catching the ball at waist level in his monkey right hand, he brought the ball over his head, driving it through the hoop so hard it shook like a spring board.” — From Nate Schweber’s Feb. 4 article on Ryan Slider titled “Back in Place, Back in One Piece” in the Montana Kaimin. Nate, you said it all when you said it.

4. Mick Holien. The Griz’s true sixth man. Everyone in the state knows that when Montana’s on TV you turn down the sound and turn your radio way, way up. The sweet, soothing tones of Holien’s golden-on-air personality help shepherd us through those nervous, sweaty times when Montana is on the road and we can’t be there. Mick, we wouldn’t trade you for ten Bob Costases. While we’re not quite sure what a “pickle barrel” is, we sure hope that, during the tournament, the Griz rattle it so hard it shakes like a spring board. — From the Irony. Even a couple of greenthorn dimwits like us are smart enough to notice the literary aspects of the past two years in the world of Griz ball. Tension and conflict, drama and humor. But most importantly, Good Vs. Evil. Last year, EWU denies our bid for the conference tourney and this season we beat THEM in the last game, for all the marbles. Coincidence? Hardy.

5. Nate Schweber’s tattoo. If you can walk with kings but not lose the common touch, you just might fit right in with the Grizzlies this year. Of all the virtues Holst and his Merry Band of Warriors possess, the way they carry themselves just might be the most admirable. Last year when the sky wasn’t so blue and the Griz were losing to teams like Sac State, you’d still be greeted with a handshake and a smile by Williams, Warhank or Holst. But the most genuine moment for us didn’t have a thing to do with basketball. Equipped with a Go-cup full of Diet Coke and voice like thunder, Don Holst sat in the student section and cheered with us plebeians as the Lady Griz volleyball team upset top-ranked Eastern Washington this fall. He was so impressed by the spinners’ courageous effort, he told the girls he only wished his team played with the same heart and intensity. Classy move, and unique too. Much as we love him, you probably won’t find Robin Selvig in the student section at the next UM soccer game. At least not with a Go-Cup.

6. Mike Warhank’s deft shooting. So let’s say this whole baby comes down to one flick of the wrist. NAU, Eastern, whomever. Who else would you want riding that wave of emotion just as it crests, deciding the Grizzlies’ fate in history? 10,000 eyes would be locked on the arm of the kid from Great Falls, the guy who was supposed to be too young to play here. So put two guys on him. Put four. He’s done it before and we like our chances. It’s storybook. It’s Hoosier-esq. So run the picket fence to Mike and don’t get caught watching the paint dry.

7. Todd Schmautz. The most excitable assistant in our program. Schmautz is guaranteed to come flying off his seat on the bench within the first three minutes of play, even if Montana is up by ten. We love the energy, we fear his wrath.

8. Men of the people. If you can walk with kings but not lose the common touch, you just might fit right in with the Grizzlies this year. Of all the virtues Holst and his Merry Band of Warriors possess, the way they carry themselves just might be the most admirable. Last year when the sky wasn’t so blue and the Griz were losing to teams like Sac State, you’d still be greeted with a handshake and a smile by Williams, Warhank or Holst. But the most genuine moment for us didn’t have a thing to do with basketball. Equipped with a Go-cup full of Diet Coke and voice like thunder, Don Holst sat in the student section and cheered with us plebeians as the Lady Griz volleyball team upset top-ranked Eastern Washington this fall. He was so impressed by the spinners’ courageous effort, he told the girls he only wished his team played with the same heart and intensity. Classy move, and unique too. Much as we love him, you probably won’t find Robin Selvig in the student section at the next UM soccer game. At least not with a Go-Cup.

9. Sam Riddle’s cooky passes. It’s not Sam’s behind-the-back passes that have made Coach Holst dance on his teeth with the bench this year; it’s the behind-the-cheerleader’s-back, over-the-head, between-the-legs, no-look, off-the-floor, drop-your-jaw, over-the-head, over-the-shoulder, drop-your-jaw, mid-air, hanging-in-traffic type passes that have caused Holst to age a few years. Still, those things are amazing when they work and the Riddler has flat out schooled some nights. He’s got a cocky swagger reminiscent of a guy named Ali, but you’d better believe Sam can sure be fun to watch.

10. The Match-up Zone. This quirky, yet suffocating defensive scheme was developed for Montana by Jud Heathcote and made a triumphant return to the program last year. During its surprise debut against Weber State, it so frustrated back-to-back conference MVP Harold Arceneaux that he tried to punch Matt Williams. Luckily for us, Harold’s combat skills appear to be on par with his English and the only damage he caused was to himself. He twisted his own knee and was ejected on the same play. Now, THAT’s talent.

11. Jared Buckmaster. If we’ve learned anything from our time covering the Griz, it’s that you can’t, you simply CANNOT leave the Riddler open on the perimeter. You might as well spot us the points. After battling a case of mononucleosis much of last season, he came back to score 68 points in Montana’s last seven games and was instrumental in our late-season run at the tourney. Guess what? Now that the Griz have finally made it to the post-season, we’re quite sure that Buck won’t pass up the opportunity to make the rest of the conference feel his pain.

12. Buck’s Socks. Pulled way up, bleached whiter than Elmer’s Paste. What’s not to love? It’s a little old school, a little new school. It’s a good look for a young man — shows that he’s all business while clearly sending the message that he’s still got love for the streets.
