Honors Composition: Fall 2003

Class Schedule

As a rule, class meets Mondays and Wednesdays only. At a set time every other week, I see each student in my office (LA 156) to review papers. Attendance in conference is mandatory; two cut classes are allowed, after which a grade is deducted from a final paper for each cut.

Paper Schedule

For each of the first twelve or so weeks of the course a paper of no less than 500 words is due. Papers relate to the readings. No late work accepted. Be sure to double-space all submissions.

Grading

None of the weekly papers is graded, though students are always free to ask about their progress. You are assumed to be busy revising throughout the term. At the day and hour set in the Schedule of Courses for a final exam (we have none), students will submit a packet of four papers: one term paper of 1250 words or more, plus three revised weeklies. The term paper will count for half of your grade, as will the other three in aggregate. Particulars for the term paper will be worked out with each student, but all should involve some additional reading. Observe that you have the option of not revising several weekly papers.

In Honors Composition excellence is something more than a slogan. Students in this course have set a high standard, and grades here are stiffer than in other sections of Composition.

Instructor's Discretion

Any student not working at the Honors level may be asked either to complete extra assignments or to leave the course.

Note

Students in this course are to edit their own work.
