A survey of medieval and modern Christian and Islamic theopolitical traditions. We will attend to: the legacy of classical antiquity and the role of canonical scriptures; politics and law, order, virtue, glory, freedom, justice and happiness; the sources, location and jurisdiction of power, sovereignty, and political authority; the separation of powers sacred and secular; interpretations of covenant, shari'a, kingship, the caliphate, theocracy, utopianism, democracy, empire, secular nationalism, modernism, and revolutionary fundamentalism. We will consider religious responses to politics: theocratic, quietistic, prophetic, apocalyptic and sapiential.

Early in the course we will also address the justification, authority and conduct of jihad and the crusades; we will look at religious sanctions of violence and warfare within and between polities, the fateful intersection of religion, politics, violence and identity formation. In the second half of the course we will also investigate the contemporary "clash of civilizations" thesis.
