This little theater, which lends itself to intimacy between actors and audience, we hope to repair and use increasingly for Masquers productions. It was constructed in 1926, under the direction of Carl Glick, author of several plays and books. It was in steady use between that date and the playing season of 1935.

When the theater was in repair, the paint was fresh, curtains hung in pleasant folds from the windows to the floors, the stage had a switchboard adequate for artistic lighting of the settings. To the north were dressing, make-up and costume rooms; and a foyer in which, by the stone fireplace, cigarettes and coffee were served to audiences between acts. Around the walls were pictures of Masquers productions.

Among this theater’s directors who left for larger positions are Carl Glick, Alexander Dean (later at Yale University), Barnard Hewitt (now at the University of Illinois).

Two Gilbert and Sullivan operas were given here, “The Pirates of Penzance” and “H. M. S. Pinafore.” Tough plays like “The Front Page;” stark tragedy, like Dane’s “Granite;” light comedies like Ervine’s “Mary, Mary Quite Contrary,” and Coward’s “Hay Fever;” expressionist plays, Capek’s “R.U.R.;” and O’Neill’s “The Hairy Ape;” mystery dramas like “The Thirteenth Chair;” Lord Dusany’s “A Night at an Inn,” Barrie’s “What Every Woman Knows,” Ibsen’s “The Wild Duck,” Echegaray’s “The World and His Wife” were produced here. The older writers like Molière “The Learned Ladies” and Shakespeare’s “Midsummer Night’s Dream” and “Twelfth Night” had their men and women on this stage. Alexander Dean offered Materlinck’s poetic fantasy “The Bluebird” and Rostand’s barnyard allegory “Chantecler;”

Other well-known plays have been seen here—by Millen, Morley, O’Casey “Juno and the Paycock,” Martinez-Sierra, Synge “Riders to the Sea,” Anatole France, Crothers, Tchekov, Bernard Shaw “The Devil’s Dickie,” Barry, Jules Romain, Ferenc Molnar, Stephen Leacock, Benevente.

Lennox Robinson (then director of the Abbey Theatre, Dublin) produced his own play “The Round Table,” and later William Angus offered Robinson’s “The Far-Off Hills.” Many plays written by students had their try-outs here—by Paul Treichler, Greta Shriver, William Neherbon, Jessie Cambron, Mrs. Angus, Harold Shaw.

This Little Theater has provided rich dramatic entertainment in the past; it intends to provide as rich fare in the future.
