Thermoluminescence

By Brendan Jordan

The sun collects in blueglass bolts—the photons freeze in jars like comets nighttime plucked and hid past purple alder boughs,

I burn them all. I chuck the wood around the gleaming heap of spilled-out marbles, worn or chipped—you left them when you left and now they spark, spit up their dregs to vanish in the dark recalling holes you punched in lids where fireflies leaked out.

I pour the coals to death. My steps retreat beyond the road.
Above the dirt and branches, years erase themselves like smoke.
