your lame starling

Juliana Lutz
your lame starling

Juliana Lutz

while i wander our sheets beautiful as a washerwoman i prioritize the occasional closets we sleep in for comfort and be sure before you leave (if you leave first) the world will not renounce us its perfect egret shifting himself a safer distance and here it is very common waking up aisles full of preservatives and people say it to each other all the time how they love subway stations. imagine you are young imagine you are two feet tall and wanting to ride in a rickshaw it is not that you remember arriving at the silence of yourself it is only that in this area of the world the word for dog and the word for heart sound very similar. but we love violent acts of preservation. we love to eat with the lights off and we love our love like catching a pillow full of rabbits with this heart and its crimped wings. so small are its portions, our cured slices we bite off before going to bed each night that once cast aglow the wedding of our sleep arrives firm handfuls of stardust in which the importance of dreaming in animals appears a little taller or entirely our hibernation.