Somewhere in Ohio

Christopher Buckley
SOMEWHERE IN OHIO

12 years away and you go back to it—that proud and middling heart pragmatic as rock sieved through steel and stadiums, the windflower way of a people taken hold where they land forever.

You were thinking of crocheted quilts, the doilies sewn around bottle caps, and not the mill grist sinking to your grandfather’s insides or choking up the river’s craw.

Like a sudden gust that nudges the tired-hard tongues of shoes left on a porch, you go among relatives, their very minds drifting absently like dust taken off high above the earth—the incidental mote sifting down to land on an iced tea or pint of rye hidden in the garage.

A sliver of sunlight through the awning brushes the hands of aunts who touch about your cheeks with fingers cold as dough and who whisper of apricots, ripe persimmon moons.

At the table where your mother sat pouring canned milk in coffee, you count the coupons into piles which discount your grandmother’s Postum, margarine, and salts—the repeating list repeating years.
Christopher Buckley

Up early on a drive to Akron or Warren.
You see them line up in a grey dawn to take their places, stone-faced, under the grinding wheel;
or filing off swing-shift blank from the blast furnace, take the concrete turnpike home where someone irons or washes-out the soiled cotton-twill, bakes Perohis for the Christening or Engagement.

Each thing you've ever seen you see one more time, and you write that you marry lucky from this place or die out the back door, and no life like this . . .