Sudden Onset of Scelerophobia

Brian Rushton
Brandon Rushton

Sudden Onset of Sclerophobia fear of wickedness

Pardon the inexcusable exercises taking place in front of the elementary: how fast can we stash a mannequin in an unmarked van. This is no lesson in clean get away. Call it what you will. A schoolteacher suggests her students are just like evidence: only good for sinking in the river. Like all lovers of distance the neighbor keeps a pair of binoculars by his backdoor which should help him see suddenly-so-unexpected can be a good thing. For example: an emergency appendectomy keeps the apple picker on his toes. It’s not a stretch to assume this is the evening the kids will take liquor straight from someone else’s mouth. Nobody here is concerned with pollution or how plastic bags suddenly become fashionable over our faces. Bad days always beg the question how much bath water must soak the ceramic tile before we pull the plug? You’ve got your feet up on the faucet and I mention, in passing, you are at your sexiest in a ski mask. My compliments are like fish going belly up, you say, a final attempt to be exposed as tender.
You’re making me out to be harder than I am.
I should confess in this city not even the cinder blocks are innocent. If you saw the boy perched on the overpass with his cargo shorts full of stones you would understand the windshield glass in my hair. You would understand me if you could see the boy. If you could see the boy drowning you would agree it looks like he needs a buoy steeping alongside in whatever body of water I left him.