Head in the Clouds

Raegan Hauschildt
Even now, I can build it up in my mind.

Barren structure, made of wood and brick, standing solemnly in a meadow of daisies. White walls, gleaming in the morning sun, dew drops covering the landscape.

There would be a subtle morning fog seeping out of the trees bordering the meadow, billowing out like a dragon’s breath, threatening the entire scenery.

Visitors would have to jump over the first step leading into the house, as it would moan violently, warning the guest that it would drop them if tested.

The front door would creak elegantly, but only those who had built this house would learn to appreciate it in its homeliness.

Pictures would cover the interior with familiar smiles of the past. Musical instruments would clutter the parlor, as if they, too, were relaxing by the fire.

What evenings there would be in front of the flickering flames. Twisted blankets on the floor, teacups on the mantle.

The only comfort of this house can be found in the love of its makers, Their hands calloused and intertwined affectionately.

This house can only be found in the stubborn memory of a dreamer, Who never breathed the crisp morning air or drank a coffee while staring out into the setting sun.

Even now, it crumbles in my hands.