11-11-1971

Congressional Record - Foreign Aid

Mike Mansfield 1903-2001

Let us know how access to this document benefits you.
Follow this and additional works at: https://scholarworks.umt.edu/mansfield_speeches

Recommended Citation
https://scholarworks.umt.edu/mansfield_speeches/1018

This Speech is brought to you for free and open access by the Mike Mansfield Papers at ScholarWorks at University of Montana. It has been accepted for inclusion in Mike Mansfield Speeches by an authorized administrator of ScholarWorks at University of Montana. For more information, please contact scholarworks@mso.umt.edu.
Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I have said very little during the course of this debate because it would only be repetition of what has been said before. I do not intend once again to list the litany of the losses—approximately 360,000 casualties—which this country has suffered in Vietnam. I do not intend to call again the attention of the Senate to the fact that we have helped create about 1 million refugees in Vietnam, 700,000 in Cambodia, and 500,000 in Laos. I do not intend to mention, except in passing, what this war has cost this country in treasure and what it is costing us now in problems.

The Senate, 2 weeks ago tomorrow night, marched up the Hill. I wonder what the Senate will do when the final rollcall comes.

What we have done so far is to bring out two bills; and we have increased the military allowance by something on the order of $318 million. Yes, we placed the emphasis once again on the area of destruction, weapons or military might.

Last night I voted against the economic-humanitarian bill which was before us. I did so with some trepidation and with some real concern, because that was a good bill, but I thought I saw the possibility of the old concept of foreign aid being recreated, the old pattern being revived, so I resolved by doubts and voted against that bill. On the basis of the way the Senate has acted so far today, I have no apologies and no regrets for my vote on yesterday. I see here the makings of what amounts to the same old game of foreign aid under new shells.

As I said 2 weeks ago, this is a watershed. What the Senate, what the Congress, what this country will do abroad is at stake in this decision.

I feel very sorry for the Laotians. I feel very sorry for the Cambodians. I feel very sorry for the Vietnamese. But I feel more sorry for the American people, I feel sorry for the American lives which have been lost, 56,000; for the wounded, 303,000; for the totally disabled, 35,000; and for the POW’s and missing in action, I think we must bring this holocaust which the foreign aid program has underwritten to a halt somehow, some way; the cost has been beyond all proportions.

One American lost in war in that part of the world was one American too many, and $1 spent in war in that part of the world was $1 too many. What have we got out of it? Drug addiction, low morale, and increasing crime, just to mention a few of the results of this misadventure in a region where we had and have no vital interest.

So I would hope that the Senate would consider what it did 2 weeks ago tomorrow night—in my judgment, a wise action—and not undo it tonight. We are again on a threshold which reaches toward a new summit or a threshold of once again retreating into the same old pattern, after 25 years of programs which have steadily degenerated, and after the expenditure of $143 billion of the people’s money.