

Fall 1986

Deep Water, Wide River

Shannon Nelson

Let us know how access to this document benefits you.

Follow this and additional works at: <https://scholarworks.umt.edu/cutbank>

 Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation

Nelson, Shannon (1986) "Deep Water, Wide River," CutBank: Vol. 1 : Iss. 25 , Article 24.
Available at: <https://scholarworks.umt.edu/cutbank/vol1/iss25/24>

This Poetry is brought to you for free and open access by ScholarWorks at University of Montana. It has been accepted for inclusion in CutBank by an authorized editor of ScholarWorks at University of Montana. For more information, please contact scholarworks@mso.umt.edu.

Deep Water, Wide River

Hillbillies from Tennessee, all twelve strummed on the big front porch which sagged like a beer belly, music twining through the creepers, dusk licking its tongue
of light around my summer bed.
I floated on their twanging boat wondering where Jordan was.

The other neighbors latched their screens, turning up Milton Berle, something in the way that family “howled” they called it, that string of harmony winding up the street like a dog, tail tucked-under, the moon a locked-in bitch in season.

But I loved the old instruments, frets worn from the oil of many fingers,
the scratched upright slightly out of tune, ivories bruised as aging flesh.
Roped to the heaped truck like a cow,
I watched them lower it,
along with banjos, guitars, mandolins, “barnyard heaven” the neighbors called it.

One of the girls taught me notes,
her thick rug-colored braids tickling my nose as she bent over me, humming like running water, Ah-ah-ma-zi-i-ing- See?
I ached for music or God as I lay in bed, listening to them sing their mother across.

Her coffin sat on the porch for three days,
the neighbors about to call the police,
the noise, they complained, the stench
of those roses— I wanted to cross the street, sing with them from the lap of their porch.
On the opposite shore, the moon rose pale and gold as the notes we held.