CONGRESSIONAL RECORD — SENATE April 8, 1974

hearings and make its judgment known to the House at the earliest possible date.

I have noticed with some concern that polls of various kinds have been taken as to how the Judiciary Committee stands and even how individual Senators stand on this matter, before all the evidence is presented, either to the committee or to the Senate. There have also been editorials and commentaries on the issue of impeachment by the House and a trial by the Senate which, I think, anticipates the question. Some Members of Congress have advocated resignation by the President. None in the Senate that I know of have suggested impeachment. My position on the question of resignation is well known; it is a question which will be decided by the President and the President alone. All this is being brought about before the issue is directly presented, either to the House or the Senate, in any constitutional form.

The questions we should ask ourselves are as follows:

Are we being impartial in fact and appearance?

Are we aware of our responsibilities, potential, and possibly real?

Are we shunting aside the basic principles of law which presume the innocence of the accused until found guilty?

Is the media living up to its responsibilities in “telling it as it is,” on the basis of corroboration, research and source material, or is it interpreting the news to support a point of view? Basically, I think the press, overall, is doing an excellent job.

Are we exercising restraint and patience? In my view, I think the Senate, by and large, is.

Are we—all of us—too emotionally involved? In my judgment, I think we are involved, because one cannot follow the media, the court proceedings, and the Watergate hearings without being concerned.

Are too many of us saying, “The votes are there in the House of Representatives”? In my opinion, no one really knows; certainly, I do not, and no one will know until and unless a vote is taken in the House on the issue involved.

If and when the issue reaches the Senate, if no one can answer the question at this time, what should the procedures in the Senate be? Should the hearings be televised? Should new rules be adopted? In my opinion, I think serious consideration should be given to the televising of any proceedings which might occur in the Senate. Extraordinary historical significance does not alone justify television. More important, the American people should see the totality of evidence when and if it is presented to the Senate so that when each Senator makes his final judgment of guilty or not guilty, the American people will be fully apprised of the basis of that judgment. I think this will be very important to assure the acceptance of the judgment by the Senate. If it should come to us, whatever it may be. However, this is a matter which will have to be decided, if and when the issue comes to the Senate, and the decision will be made by the Senate as a whole, after giving full consideration to the views of all persons involved.

WATERGATE

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, 1 year of Watergate is too much; 1 day of Watergate is too much, but the issue will have to run its course. It would be my hope that the Senate Select Committee on the Watergate and related matters would be able to complete its business by May 28 and, at that time, it would turn over the evidence accumulated and its recommendations to Special Prosecutor Leon Jaworski on the one hand, and the House Judiciary Committee on the other.

At the same time, I would hope it would make whatever legislative recommendations it feels necessary to the Senate for consideration. In my opinion, the Special Prosecutor and the courts are doing the job and doing it well. I note that Mr. Jaworski stated that it would take several years to clear the Watergate and related matters through the courts.

The House Judiciary Committee is doing its job extremely well and the lack of leaks out of that committee is a most encouraging sign. I would hope that the White House and the committee would get together on the differences which are keeping them apart and arrive at a satisfactory accommodation so that the Judiciary Committee could get on with its

We see members of Congress routinely predicting the President will quit sooner than face an impeachment proceeding. We are well aware that the President has never openly announced their intention to impeach, even when they knew what charges will be, if indeed there are charges. Senate Majority Leader Mansfield and Wilbur Mills of the House have publicly stated that there are enough votes in the Senate to impeach, which can only be described as bandwagon politics. Among the charges are the odomaker, conducts a private poll to detect which way members are leaning and, incredibly, gets responses. The franking privilege is being used to promote grass-roots impeachment petitions. And all over Capitol Hill there are bills being drawn up of Senators "likely" to convict and "likely" to acquit.

It's as if, during the trial of the "Chicago Seven," the jurors were permitted to pop up periodically to exonerate the defendants, among the Chicago allowed in the jury box to conduct a running poll of sentiment that he could flash back to Vegas, and Judge Julius Hoffman allowed to colligate for conviction that he could lay before the court.

In a criminal proceeding, there is good reason why the defense is allowed to participate in jury selection. Given our most serious charges, an unfriendly or hostile jury can be found in such a case, to sequester it from outside influence during the trial.

Of course, all these precautions are impossible in an impeachment proceeding. The President can challenge only Congress can't be sequestered from the influences of the press. And Capitol Hill can't be moved to Cedar Rapids. Nor should any of these things be done even if it were possible.

But this makes it all the more important that Congress get a grip on itself and agree on formalities and rituals appropriate to a Grand Inquest, to require rules of conduct that will have the effect of changing venue from a court ruled by passion to one composed.

The Mansfields, Scotts and Albertas cannot simply wash their hands of responsibility, arguing they have no authority to impeach the free speech or activities of freely elected Congress would agree to rules of conduct, its leaders would per force have the power to at least verbally censure transgressors. The mere existence of a code, where there is none now, would provide a sobering frame of reference for the great majority of the House and Senate would otherwise say or do anything because of the provocative climate that prevails.

And if the leaders of Congress can't bring themselves to regain a semblance of control over these events, at least individual members of the House and Senate can make personal commitments to contribute nothing to the carnival that ensues. Those who have already allowed themselves to suspend judgment, allowing aside the odomakers and pollsters and asking their staffs to do the same. They can begin by resisting the outrageous pressure many might feel over the way the accused casts on his rights and loudly proclaims his innocence.

If this be the case, I repeat: the Senate of the United States has a duty to impeach the President of the United States to get a fair trial in Washington, D.C., and however he is ultimately judged, people will be able to say that justice was done.

Mr. HUGH SCOTT. Mr. President, I will have more to say at a later time, because this suggestion has just been advanced by the distinguished majority leader. I will be glad, of course, to confer with him on anything that pertains to the Senate business, if, as, and when there appears to be reason to believe that it will become Senate business.

I very much fear that the statement of the distinguished majority leader may not have been brought to the attention of the American people with the full force of what he has said, because perhaps the new values, a first blush, is that he has suggested that the proceedings be televised. At this point, I am not prepared to make any statement on that. But he has said something that both he and I have continually said, and I get the impression that we are simply talking into one another's ear.

Are we shunting aside the basic principle on which rests the innocence of the accused until found guilty?

He has also cautioned against Members of this body saying that the votes are there in the House of Representatives, and he says that he does not know—and he questions whether others know, unless and until a vote is taken in the House. I agree with that. I think I have heard from over there is subjectively expressed by the person who tells me. Some people say the votes are not there; some people say they are.

I think that when the Senate intervenes in the affairs of the House by pronouncement and projection of something it really does not know anything about, because it must get into the minds of 435 people and come out at the other end with an answer, this is a disservice to the process.

The distinguished majority leader also says that the American people would see the totality of the evidence, and if it is presented to the Senate. I stress again, "when and if." So that this statement which has been said will not be treated as an acknowledgment that the proceedings will occur before the Senate, but he has been most careful in his fairness, as he is always so fair, to stress the "when and if."

He said so far as the proceedings are concerned, if and when he will discuss these matters with me and, of course, an executive session would seem to be in order for that purpose. I would be inclined to agree personally. I think it is a matter for my party and the majority leader's party to determine whether or not an executive session is desired. I would stay in this thing at this stage and seem to me that would be the best way to consider a situation rather than to try to get any matter that may appear on the floor which does not represent considered judgments.

Now, we can head in one of two directions, or pursue, as the Senate has tried to do generally, a middle course. The middle course, it seems to me, ought to steer us very much closer to one of the polarities than the other, and the one polarity would be a total and complete impartiality, an absence of any partisan fervor, and a full and dispassionate, as well as compassionate approach to any problem that comes to us, if an when it does.

The other polarity would be an excess of party fervor, as in the Johnson matter, leading to the allegation that the election of 1972 was stolen in 1974. That was we must avoid at all cost. We must avoid the partisanship which might arise if the parties divide in the consideration of this matter in such fashion as to lend credence to a public assumption of that awful and intolerable conclusion.

On the other hand, it is impossible for humanity and human nature to be totally and completely dispassionate and impartial. I suggest that this is the time for us to consider that that is where our duty lies.

I will have more to say later.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUGH SCOTT. I am glad to yield to the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Speaking as the majority leader, I want to assure you that if and when the issue comes to the Senate there will be as little partisanship as possible, and as far as I am concerned, I would hope there would be none.

Furthermore, if and when the issue comes to the Senate, and we will never know until the House decides one way or the other—negatively it will not; affirmatively it will—then, I would point out, the Senate itself will also be on trial. I would point out further that while this Senate, if and when the issue comes to this body, renders a verdict, the final jury and the final judge will be out there among the people who elect us, because, after all, when we speak of the Government of the United States, we speak of the people of this Republic, and they are the final arbiters. They will watch us carefully as they should.

May I say in passing that when an issue of this nature comes to the Senate and is to be televised, that would be subject to the approval of the Senate as a whole. I am expressing a personal opinion that there will be no circus, that there will be nothing in the way of hanky-panky, because I would expect and anticipate without question that every Senator would act with the greatest dignity and circumspection, and that there would be no hamming on the part of any Member of this body, if it happens to turn out that way, that the proceedings, if and when the question comes to this body, are televised.

Mr. HUGH SCOTT. Therefore, justice must not only be done; justice must seem to have been done. Fiat Justitia must be the guideline if and when this happens, and finally woe unto those who seek to act on other than the facts and evidence.
