A chance to really get a look at the Montana wilderness instead of scanning it through binoculars from the roadside was offered to University of Montana summer session students by Dr. Wally Schwank, director of Health, PE and Athletics. Schwank has planned two one-night horseback pack trips into the Mission mountain area, and the trips will be open to students and faculty.

First journey into the wilds will leave the Jocko Valley campsite on the morning of Thursday, July 22. The second trip will take place the following day. While horses and food will be furnished the campers, fishing tackle and sleeping bags will have to be provided by the individuals, Schwank said. He added that it is his opinion that many out of state visitors never get a chance to see the native wilderness that is in Montana, and the two trips were arranged to remedy that situation at least in part. If successful, Schwank plans to arrange other similar trips in future seasons.
