The woman smoothing her son's bangs

Glori Simmons
Glori Simmons

THE WOMAN SMOOTHING HER SON'S BANGS

Looks young against the Dakota snow.
Her dad's a bird man, she tells me, when a pheasant jumps a post.

She misses it—
the town where her father's mayor and taxidermist,

where there's not much use in whispering, the church secretary leaving casseroles in your mailbox with bad news.

The furrow where sky and field meet is little more than a suggestion like the nod that says I'm listening or the house without door her son outlines on the train window.

Out there—her ex feeds kindling to a needy wood stove, warming a room for a new girl who wears thermals and slippers most days.

So quiet when she enters a room he doesn't even notice her.

His white-sided house stands invisible in these plains that give up only game tracks, a thin vein of barbed wire.