NATIONALLY KNOWN AUTHORS PUBLISH IN MONTANA JOURNALISM REVIEW

Articles by three nationally known writers appear in the 1966 edition of the Montana Journalism Review.

The 40-page periodical, issued each spring by the University of Montana School of Journalism, contains nine articles, three research summaries and a poem from the Virginia City Montana Post, the first newspaper in Montana Territory.

Warren J. Brier, editor and associate professor of journalism, said the Review is being distributed this week to educators, journalists and research scholars throughout the United States.

The lead article, "On Being Nothinged to Death," is the text of a speech by Shana Alexander, Life magazine columnist, to the 10th annual Dean Stone Night banquet at the University of Montana last month. She also was the 1966 professional lecturer at the Journalism school.

Vern Haugland, aviation editor of the Associated Press, presents a newsman's view of America's first steps into the Space Age. Haugland is a 1931 graduate of the School of Journalism.

Dorothy M. Johnson, author of seven books and numerous short stories and articles for the nation's leading magazines, describes how she nominated Mel Ruder, editor and publisher of the Columbia Falls, Mont., Hungry Horse News, for a Pulitzer Prize in 1965. Miss Johnson, secretary-manager of the Montana Press Association, is an assistant professor of journalism at the University.

Other contributions are by journalism graduates Jerry Holloron, Larry Cripe and Edward Nicholls; graduate students Robert M. Amick and Lyle E. Harris, and journalism professors Philip J. Hess, Lee Norton, Dean Rea and Brier.

Rea's eight-page article about Montana press law is a special section that may be taken out of the periodical.
