First Winter Poem When the Dreams Lift

Britta Ameel
Britta Ameel

First Winter Poem When the Dreams Shift

I dreamt a bowl full of pearls.
A white boat dressed the horizon.
There once was a dressmaker whose dreams filled with bolts of white fabric so porous it took its wearer’s shape
upon touch, temperature.
And the next night, a pearl sword.
Death felt like nothing.
Even the moon is battered like a silver bowl when its ellipse flies less than perfect.
Have I not somewhere scrutinized
a dead white-feathered moth laying eggs?
Did the eggs first bother me, or the death?
Were they not the pearl earrings
I dreamt I lost when I escaped the chalk prison dripping water from its ceiling?
In another, I am the woman sealed in by heat, a second skin of white fabric.
I am a cut out of another person, white even on the soles of my feet.
I am guilty in my dreams, running with white teeth from the bright contrasts of bodies in snow. Dark coats and pocked landscapes. The dressmaker stitches the shutters. I am trying to equate my mistakes with their consequences
and everything adds up to the pearls.
They pour out of my mouth in strings
when I try to explain.
I have stayed too long on my back where the stand sticks to my tongue.
I dreamt the white-feathered moth left white cutouts on the moon
which had turned into a bowl of water, pearl bubbles expanding from the center
and white boats popping at the surface.
Everything is brighter from far away and set against the snow. Close up, dull as beach glass wintered with sand.