HUNTING

The first one you followed that night walked to your door instead of the bed at the day's ragged edge. The second you saw propped up at the truck stop, fingers broken. The last one sketched a constellation and wept there, his moon was his heavy head. You watched quietly from his closet since you weren't invited in.

But the trees had asked to be burned open. Their pulp, you could make a home in it & since all their needles spelled your name you could stop trying to take someone else's.
