Flying Above the Missouri

Ricardo Pau-Llosa

Let us know how access to this document benefits you.

Follow this and additional works at: https://scholarworks.umt.edu/cutbank

Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation
Available at: https://scholarworks.umt.edu/cutbank/vol1/iss77/12

This Poetry is brought to you for free and open access by ScholarWorks at University of Montana. It has been accepted for inclusion in CutBank by an authorized editor of ScholarWorks at University of Montana. For more information, please contact scholarworks@mso.umt.edu.
FLYING ABOVE MISSOURI

[Isaiah 5:13]

By bends the river weighs the ground’s merit.
Angling for a destined south that now slopes
the other cardinals to wherever the dryness tows calligraphy.

Internal shore, the mind’s pole
for the pumice flat, it confounds its predicate role.
The River is the verb of the verb nation.

Lost it never seems through arcs that will not guide the geese chevron or this plane mapped and scheduled between earth and heaven
gulping clouds in rows, climate’s abacus.

A chatty native in the next seat pulls me to his boyhood “There.”
These molten lights breathed his dense, intended flow.
He's counted all his man days
since this water was his home.
Cradle, speaker, mast
upon which a people
swayed storm into course.

Briefly, as he rambles, I ponder
the landscape as would be mine.
I am fluent yet foreign
to its syllables.
Sibilant formed,
the spinal undulant
shapes the compass
by which a race I know
but will not know me
knows and is known.