I

THE DENSE COLOR OF THE BIOLOGIST'S ROOM

I've spent years collecting anecdotes of natural separation-- tales of salmon on a last run upriver, the mating dance of stoneflies, the quiet thrashing of bees.

What a waste of time. These rooms empty like abandoned mirrors.

I spend whole afternoons watching winter: the yard outside my window littered with papery leaves, the spare lines of church steeples and damp alleys where dogs turn against the wind.
This year I feel a primitive comfort in bare trees, like a ragged, one-eyed crow.

It does not matter that light fails early this far north.

It does not matter that wind mutters in the stairwell like a familiar voice.
All I need is in a drop of pond water under this lens, all the basic arrangements of predator and prey.

I sit at my desk keeping notes, accumulating data, writing words that always mean lamp, letter, autumn and dust.

THE HAIRLINE FAULT AT THE CENTER

Secretly we believe in the perfectly round and this myth is universal: a man and woman, halves of a whole stone, roll downhill. At the bottom the stone breaks and two fragments begin crawling back.

So everyday in the morning someone waits like spare change, the pieces laid out on a dresser, or stands at the bus stop fingering the coins in his pocket as he toes the crack in the sidewalk.

There is always a slight variation--a different voice, a different streetlight in the alley.

But one after another we wipe the dirt from our knees and shuffle off, smiling, in any direction.

LEAVING PARK COUNTY

All winter snow flamed each morning on the Crazies, and I drifted through the days like a raven through endless blue sky.
A man can lose anything here overnight.
Shattered boulders along the Sweetwater, those cracked stones trapped side by side by their own weight, are my idea of a lasting connection.
Centuries won't heal them.

I have to thank Park County for that lesson in permanence-- how even the river changes its bed, how lone snow geese wait on the nest whispering a name from the south.
Cattails rattle on, a voice in a dry wind telling what happens in a two-bit railroad town.

Rusted rails arrow away from the heart of this country. Knapweed shades the cross-ties.
It is not endurance that puzzles me.
It is an attic window overlooking the church. It is getting out of bed in the bloody sunrise of a January morning, alarm clock humming on the nightstand, a lovely shadow turning to the wall.

A WINTER SHIFT

Once every afternoon, the headrig breaks down and this cranky stud mill rattles into silence. Belts clank to a halt, the edger throttles down slowly, and millwrights cover the jammed scrag saw like bees on a honeycomb.

In the brief stillness, a few gentle sounds murmur along the pond's lip: lodgepole knocking softly on the pier, a plaintive whistle, the background drip of water.

My partner and I sit on stumps of wood in the failing sunlight, stealing a little break time.
Our backs begin to steam.
Tomorrow we'll wake with our knuckles curled like claws, as though even in sleep we gripped a pike pole.

Still, as the air cools our damp wool clothes, the broad paints of sunset start to blue on the mountains, and the first faint star appears.

We rise and flex our fingers as the line begins to run.

SURVEY CHIEF AT BIGFORK

The Missions close down like a wall hiding the backcountry. There must be secret passages up there leading to peaks that stare blindly at one another. Snow covers tamaracks and bearberry on the shaded north face and even bright days freeze bare fingers to the transit.
Six hundred feet of backbone to run and the ravens sail by like side-armed coins.

No town in Montana could ease this wind.
It blows all the way from Canada, rounding snow into the curves and bellies of winter. Pulling chain down the line, it all comes clear: how you impose order on a life where lovers walk out, how you limit the world to a few bald colors, geometric lines, a lasting desire to keep warm.

On the bay, storms polish the inner ice mirror-smooth, til it shines back the midday moon.
Every boundary runs six feet above mean high water.
Measuring the way my life backs up when things go wrong, I reach for simple puzzles the brain can solve--the long leg of a right triangle, the exact location of original stones. Flathead Lake shelters you from nothing at all.

In light this bitter, you can't hide your mistakes-- minutes missing in a circle, cold nights, the drifted footprints leading in.

TRAVELLING THROUGH A CUP OF WATER

Winters I imagine swimming from the bottom of this glass back to the tap, down a pipe to the well.
Through a dark seam I track the drink to its source-- deep pools where cutthroat float over sunlit gravel.
Or farther, back to snow, back to vapor rising from a tidal pond where sea urchins hunt in slow motion.

I envy B.C. in the funnies shaping water in his hands, round balls dipped from the stream, molded, piled on the bank.
Hours I've tried to make a globe held perfect by surface tension.
I want to see sunlight refract through a glass-clear heart, fanning rainbows through my fingers.
I want to put a mosquito fish in the center and carry it in my hands like a portable aquatic zoo.

It never works. Every night in winter I stand at the sink, water spinning into the drain.
Another river gathers below the street, all the discarded streams of the city running to an open sun.

FACING FACTS IN THE RED DESERT

After weeks along the dry washes and daily exposure on the sun's flat blanket, your convictions begin to fray. You start to wonder if most humans are like those creosote plants which poison the ground around them and live out their scratch-paper lives in a naked circle of sand.

This could have soothed you once: the idea that the world runs some natural parallel, that the wind really does moan, birds sing, and the night cries of the desert are wasted too.

You're not sure now.

Only erosion is certain, the steady unfolding of days. In the parched heart of the continent, the sky is relentlessly clear and never watches you.

In the restless hours after dinner you brought out, night after night, a black, thirty-eight ounce bat I could barely swing.

In the quiet twilight as crickets began to chirp in the grass, you hit graceful, curving flies against the evening sun. I thought of them as birds, Father, not baseballs, doves filling the air between us.

I ran around those weedlots and monkey-bars and saved one falling body after another.

As streetlights winked on one by one all around the neighborhood, I heard only the sounds of wind, wood and leather, or the silence that fell as I watched you hit in the distance.

BIRD COUNT ON THE UPPER GALLATIN

Across these willowy meadows I hear the clatter of a distant wedge of Canada geese.

Their migration saddens me, the certainty they live by as they leave together each fall, and turn, and veer through the wind.

I test the air with a few blades of cheatgrass, jealous of the flock's high, thin flight, as though at that altitude they could brush their wing tips along the curvature of the earth.

I pick a fragment of red dolomite from the river and throw it at the sun, trying to decipher the language in those cries that pass overhead.
The stone falls back, as usual, while I wait for a sign or a clear, unwavering light.

LETTER FROM NAPA TO A FRIEND TEACHING IN DODSON
(for Jim Walker)

Wind scratches through the dried leaves of California live-oak and dances among the knotted grapevines in a vineyard across the road.
Today I leaned against a locked gate on a dusty lane outside Yountville and remembered the night we talked til dawn: moths battered their wings against the porch screen and our voices reached a low note of weariness.
This afternoon a covey of quail invaded the garden, slipping nervously through shifting patches of shadow.
They ate stray kernels of Indian corn or swallowed the bare earth whole.
It was one of those little acts of dignity that happen even here, and I thought of you on the Highline, that prairie wind setting its teeth in the eaves of your house, the razor-cold midnights when a pulse of green light flares across the north.
I imagine you wake each day the same way I do. You brew a cup of coffee to warm your hands thinking nothing especially bad could possibly come.

INSTRUCTIONS FOR A SECTION BREAKDOWN

Every survey starts with the original stone, identified by the scars cut deeply into one face. These corners we call monuments because they lie buried like treasures in the forest floor.
Some men search for them on their knees as though the reward were gold, not the ashes of a burned post.
The idea is to find a point of origin, a place of beginning you feel confidence in.

Once you find one, start. The difficulty lies in seeing your world as a circle that you are not at the middle of.
Instead, you live on the rim and move along the boundary dragging a steel chain, measuring forward, looking back-- especially looking back. Here, as nowhere else, your backsight has to be perfect. That is the problem: this job demands you find where you're going by never leaving where you've been.

NIGHT WATCH ON ALDER STREET

Because it is a Sunday evening in mid-January and the windows light one by one, I have nothing to do but sit in the gathering dusk and think about house plants.

The schefflera, for instance, our longest living domestic.
Given four hours of daily sun, moderately dry soil, and a handful of bone meal twice a year, the schefflera will grow six feet tall.

This, of course, guarantees nothing.

The plant eventually dies, victim of spider mites.

The gardener, growing older, mumbles at the coleus and waters his windowbox chervil.

He patterns his life after the quiet breath of a leaf, falling asleep at night to the sound of a root's tender thrust in the sand.

This is the illusion: that leaves nod to us in the rain, that the gardener's gentle life earns approval.

That he will not strand his car in a creekbed in the dark twenty-five miles from home, and if he does, the wild tangles of willow will not lean over him in the morning shaking their branches like chains.

There is a moon tonight, a thin gold curl.

I prop my feet on the desk, tired of the distraction, the lost glove, the small deceiving act. Tired at last of the broken affair and the final ring of a phone.
It is a new year, and hope trails through our lives like a vine.

SELF-PORTRAIT WITH AN AIRBRUSH

In this postcard, I have become a blot in the foreground. Naturally, Gem Lake makes a better picture with only autumn's gold larch and the thin dusting of snow over the cirque.
But I'm there, carefully hidden, visible only to the practiced eye.
My dark blue coat blends neatly with water, and my legs have been disguised as shadows on the rock.

My image has begun his new life in the 4x6 boundary of the print. He camps openly on the shore, warms himself in the plain morning light, and believes he is a beacon with a blue lake shining through his chest.

Travelling secretly by mail, he often finds his way into rooms full of abandoned shoe salesmen.
He brings them greetings, messages from Montana:

"Love ya," or "I'll see you when...."
Sometimes, they tack him to the wall where he fishes happily on his flat postcard lake. The water is always clear, and he whistles little tunes, singing gaily to the trout, and smiles when the salesmen peer sadly in.

CLARK KENT MEETS THE HEART OF CIVILIZATION

It's a swell idea, a twenty-four hour lollipop in the news. It's a pinhole in the daytime that lets in carefully selected angles of light, all upside-down and miniature, like images in the camera obscura of an old cardboard box.

Anyway, we all feel better thinking there's someone out there in a blue bodysuit who cooks lunch in the Fortress of Solitude.
Sure he watches over us, keeping an eye out for the mean dogteeth of life. But my goodness, here is the moon shining on my house.

My friends the field mice gather their bags in the street.
All the futures hang like flimsy curtains the past keeps crowding up to.

On the other side, I suspect, is more of the same: pine trees bending toward the window, the insurance long overdue.

SITTING DOWN TO PAY THE WATER BILL

Maybe you misunderstood and simply expected too much: thick pan gravy every day or a warm front in the emotional weather.

When you wake each morning you find another dream got lost from the shelf or just broke during the night after a long fall to the floor.
Someone always creeps in early to strip the wreckage for parts, so by daylight even the glass is gone.
Remember the plan for finding your own little niche in the forest, how sparrows gathered at the window like a company of spectacled bandits feuding over the seeds?

If you close your eyes, the mist might still rise under the hemlocks and a string of mule deer step lightly out at dawn.
The lead buck minces back and forth as if he wanted to tell the rest "Look, we don't have that much time."
And we don't. After all, that perfect row of expectations you've kept by the knickknacks is already coming due. They've begun to grow some dark spots like the Halloween pumpkin at midnight: you no longer notice the eyes or teeth, only the shell protecting the flame.

MUSIC MY GRANDFATHER GAVE ME

As a boy on my first visit I thought a metronome triggered the strange, nervous motion of your hands. I was only six but remember how quiet it was in your third floor studio, how my mother spoke aimlessly in the summer heat, how my father pursed his awkward lips on the brass mouthpiece of a new trombone. The weather was cloudless and still, as though air in Ohio never moved at all, and I leaned out the window watching a square of waxed paper drift to the pavement below.

When we met next, twelve years later, I saw for the first time how thin the men in our family are-- you, my father, me.
Locusts hummed in the white oak and I waited, eighteen and unannounced, scuffing my shoes on the smooth porch boards til the nurse brought you, that evasive look of the failed suicide trapped in your eyes.

The true music of our family line backed up on the air between us.

I dreamed an old man walked with me on the beach and as the sea crashed down we built a clear, geodesic dome on the sand. Waves thrashed against the glass as the old man leaned to me and whispered that I was dead. In the wings, my father waited silently, as we have waited all our lives.
We held each other then, and even in my sleep I wept for those perfect mornings, the taste of strawberry fresh on my tongue.

RECOLLECTION, SOMEONE SAID, IS A TERRITORY OF ONE

Later, we assumed it was a problem of language, our inability to describe perfectly the diagonal shafts of yellow light on a stormy afternoon, or the spokes of a spider web glittering in the rain.
Recalling what we saw, no one could pin down the exact emotion, the near-fullness.

Summer evenings I spin for myself the fine threads of hindsight, recreating the past as though it were a woolen yarn I could weave to fit my needs: I walked with a woman once along the river as the sun slanted low, and watched the long rays catch in the wings of caddisflies flickering over the streams. I imagine it completely, what she said, how I held my hands, the window that closed between us.

It is a single strand of distance where I invent the story, free to make up all the satisfying possibilities. Every word, street or conversation pried like nails from a board bands, wrapping around me like a robe around a contented swimmer who has finished the race and thinks he has all the time in the world.

THE NEW MOOD OF THE COUNTRY

Here are the plums and feathers raining down, the lemon-scented confections. Here are the beery kisses, the three-piece suits that collect in the trees.
Clocks ripple ahead like pond water or pine oil, flowing the same direction. Here is the heartwood and the dark streak in the grain.
Here is the sharp needle in the miner's breath, the cross hairs, the limp fish gulping a vinegar rain, here is the half cup of milk floating its crust of bread and the luminous beetles that grow in the night.
Here are the splinters, the marrow, the grease that shines on the wall.
Here is the sledge that falls in the slaughterhouse, the ox that drops to its knees.

BIRTH OF A BRUSH WAR, 1877

If you stand on the small bluff overlooking the Big Hole as it curves around slow bends of willow and dogwood, or walk along the worn trail east of the river where grasshoppers buzz through the buffalo grass, you might come one step closer to discovering the murder that still lives in our bones.
Late summer burrows through the meadow like a pulse through blood, and you stand at one more backwater of history where the first streaks of sunlight were reddened by smoke, and Ollokot, as he recaptured the dying, knew that his god was done. There were no heroics. Gibbon's drunken men charged through the willow beds in a cold morning mist and something sadly human crooned over the water.

The dead were spared the long bitterness of hope, the last bag of pemmican as it disappeared before winter.
Listen--the stuttered cry of a heron hiding in the reeds, the dry hush of cattails, a redwing, the faint music Looking Glass heard as he called to his sons from the hill.

EROS AND THANATOS

This morning you read me a story from the paper datelined Rome. A contessa chained by her family in a closet fifty years was freed by state police. Her two sisters and a brother cited family honor as their defense.
She was carried, blind and wormlike, into a marble hall, into the sunlight she no longer remembered where a rose grew in a pale white vase and a plate of abalone soaked in lemon.

In our bedroom the bright haze of sunset pours in like a wave of impenetrable grace.
Caught in the easy complacency of our quiet life, we strip silk from ears of corn while a radio drones on under the cottonwood.
Scallions lie wet and green on the kitchen counter, the sliced halves of tomatoes gleaming on a cutting board.
In our constant confusion, you and I grow stately and distant as angelfish, the sand carefully swept, the dead taken away. Darkness finally drives us to bed, but we lie awake in the summer heat picking over the fragments of silence, the slivers of decency we cling to.

It's not as if the world were fresh, nor cruelty especially new. We have simply perfected our defenses.
