Maybe the herons say what we say when we speak without expectation—words following curiosity—the path of atmosphere the winged call their own. Smoke billows in the blue sky above Trapper Peak & the rest of what we say is sunlight in the window, the attempt to enter

what holds us & pushes us away, un-hatched egg tucked in woodchips at the park—when pierced with a needle and drained of the vitellum something else grows wings.

Each thing we do takes us to the next thing we do.

This is the painting of the un-hatched egg, the globefish flashing in current.
Time is the drift of all the globular fish—what are we willing to waste it on?

Here are the boots for when rain fills the birdbath, bowls fashioned from clay, red speckled, & all of the un-hatched eggs nestled on roof-tops in the middle of cities—creek-beds stood on end.

Here are two blue herons.
Here is a map. This is where they will go when they die.
This is what they will bring.

here/there

Pinions edging the midnight eaves, lifting in pairs, & falling swift-tumble, aerial-coupling, the mayflies: aerialplankton, sift from the fragile light; dormers darkening with the swift's echoing:

here—the chimney's coordinate revealed; there—the chimney brimmed—vacant but for sparks; here— chimney hollow, swifts funneling in funnel-symmetry & how concentrated: cistern, solarium. Fog's lowest ply caught in the top branches like voile stretched in the scarf's hitched weave.

Gravity drags snow from the low roofs, hangs it from the eaves, soffit atop rows of brownstones quantified in pairs. Swift's de-chimney through flutter-thrummed concussions of air—born from squares of colored paper, little birds—eyes viscous-black—nearly alert to the moths troubling the streetlight, the helical leaves; some settling in the dark grass, others rising just enough for the young girl folding to regard the paper-like foliage as swifts lifting from the low branches; en-route to the city's chimneys, containers papered in names:

cistern, solarium. The birds shirred on the table.
Outside, trees to assail the stillness

& bird's veins beginning to fill with directions of flight, poised like human eyes tarrying the rooftops for the chimney swifts; wings assembled emeraldred & black—as within—bone-pockets filling with weightless air.

Storm, Ab Ovo &

invisible, but for the branches breaking in wind untethered, not ceramic holding tea or hand holding ceramic and sip of tea settling in stomach tissue, endpoint of infinite perception, perception in diluvial light, sinking from the window, abelia trembling; the senses, not separate until they appear on paper as downed power-lines lashing & lashed tarp tight, not separate but serried molecules;

dirt, beginning & end, wind & steel, water-brain within & out of the human skin—ten-pound organ, rain storm and roof acoustooptic hollow-wood-stretch.

These bodies expanding, not room reducing, not everywhere all at once, but the space that will be empty when I leave it.

Rain expiring & the end of.
Ankle-swivel & unlit wick, invisible pen—but still penning letters

upon this relic abelia, penning black branches into pausing, this blue raincoat hanging on blue hanger.

Sleeves hanging the way arms hang in the absence of arms; so still,

this person—this room an absence of light, this paper not paper, but cerebral unfolding, snow-scroll, blown & blown

in drifts, storm ab ovo—
this rain, that.

Portal

Rag of colts fringe-tipped by wind, & unfolding over the basin's parched terrain—rising easterly—the fissured ridgeline crumbing the basin floor, boulders rolled & rocks plangent, swath fresh scar & the switchgrass beneath the widening sky, mottled foal nosing the fieldstone; portal into degrees difference, proscenium arch leading the horses to shade in the reach of the sun-drenched boulders; portal:

the river's bridge we look over from our passing cars, earth exposed in the scour, river's drift, road-cut blasted with Roosevelt dynamite;

night-crossing the bridge's south-end where headlights invent cement guard-rails, a body reclined atop them, river swift & lit by the sidewalk lights as meteors flash against the dark blue sky. And we have gone on to say suspicion: bridge activity implying uncertain outcomes—come the river—gone be the rocks, read & re-read is the land's lilt & shift, sift of earth's surface, ocean & water dredging the tops of mountains. Gone be the sludge from the slaughterhouse, filling pipes beneath the city, the catfish lengthening in murk downstream, where fishermen cast cable, end-gaffed with pigeon flesh, pierced & current pulled until the cable throbs & pickups haul channel cats from the current seam—algae, eddy-twisted into the river's throbbing tumor. Whiskered thing hover the silt bottom, navigating brusque water, the rusting fenders, two or three dulsecovered chassis'; the boxcar, silt-filled

& there only because we heard the winter derailment; two cars spin-drifting as far from the train, skid & spark-surged over cement, the city's southern edge & displaced water, water removed from its sedentary lull—vertical swelling, molecules shaping the boxcar plunge, swallowed whole the steel freight, portal: anything from the chain, unchained; gone be the clarity of entrance, through which all description is lost.

Pend Oreille

Or the rain is already here, already flooding the boundaries of cities sketched in sand, rain pulling the fish from sleep as fleets of submarines pass below I watch for the periscopes flashing.

Larches lean in wind, slight gesture—Ceres beside herself, knee-deep in the aster and goodnight Idaho, the lake is turning to meadow, this breathing—accurate in emptiness—and deer look through the eyes of fish. The ground into which larch trees decay hastens after all the impossible arching—some new light, suggestion: marmoreal unmoving, periscope-flash in the distance, cold air wafts into this room where the cedar logs are cedar logs, then burst gills and fin through the aqueous moon. Words energized in metered scintilla, aster & chicory shake in wind and rain clouds are not rain clouds, but currents of the Atmospheric River.

Cinderpulse

Winter night, clothes strewn in a current on the wood floor;

rain-dappled window-glass, fog wishboned over it—midnight field emerging in silvering light, deer tonguing the grass, relic bunches bent in snow, birds settling beneath undone trees, in sky lacquered black of Japanese wooden boxes; eye enameling what the self softens, air & warm air, the window publishing fingerprints, small letters: attention to what night tenders.

Cold air turns the dozen or so oak leaves away from themselves and into the shared space of store-clerks, magpies & blueprints of snowmen. Sifting elderberry from the backyards of people with first, middle and last names, black bears cross the side streets as the dog claws dry vines through dry vines. In roof-top shadows, the swallows and crows gutter, the farm ponds and lawn chairs plead sunlight to pull everything it can into stillness.

As we shudder in the silences between our tongues, do we begin to quit our desire? Somewhere there is a word that means forever

& never; the zinnias inherit what our bodies cannot contain.

We fold paper into cups that will hold the sea.

Somewhere, a blackbird is calling, silver-lipped, something whispered.

Two Veterans on a frozen pond pull trout from a hole the fish mistake for the moon.

They sip bourbon, admitting the cold and cannot imagine the other side of the ice, its cryptic dark. They begin to believe the small hooks piercing the lips of fish are not hooks but the last sentences they will never say to their lovely sons.

Waxwing, rustlehush gathered above ground, this undoing embers in the waiting, paused before breath calls it into creeping—go on embers, kindle through skin & roots—

force them up for air in the bend of bunchgrass over rabbit tracks disappearing, fir needles, needle deep and the waxwings carry what they carry into evening; cinders from summer fires embering, go on cinders, settle in to root's breath—cold as the bucket hipped from the river—this air in the tops of trees, where little light; this hush—something that might settle in.

Letter to William Stafford

Where to look for those reassuring sentences, each affirming every move as a necessary weave to some quiet fabric?
When they asked where to find the thread you fashioned I'd like to believe you led them to moving water. You would have liked walking the Bitterroot with Duncan, & Hugo might have learned where brown trout tend to feed at dusk.
The people I need are all around me.
When my father visits from Oregon, he sketches red willows in snow. This valley is becoming smaller & the deer are backtracking through each other's dreams. My neighbor buries books between rows of kale; if I find one of your poems I will call it Dirt, Beginning & End. What I have been trying to say is that everyone I have ever loved is still living.
Some are living slow & slipping toward the edges & their words feel like tracks, cycling. I look for threads you may have left between words like reticent & lean, for the blue to reserve for my private folds of cloth, how to trust the origin of things—

Reduction

Fulvous light, rectangled on the wood floor is moon reduced to window frame.

Sound reduced to anechoic is the blood's mute breath, circulatory drone.

Coyote howl is multiplied by howl—not four legs loping amid thin stands of snow-covered pines; winter fur—tawny, silver-pocked belly hair brushing the snow as the wind sunders—ears honed toward limb snapping & pinecones racketing frozen ground, the sylvan mutterings.

But all of this is half-imagined.
The rest—footprint's constellating dollops in a cerulean maze.

In our houses: the books &
the chairs that will outlive us.
Having tried to place things in a context of particulars; thumbprint's narrowing details, but the print is the hand gripping the shovel as you dig in the bunchgrass for what might be your own minutes fixed in clay. Or, you are digging a little grave, white & blue rocks pebbling to the bottom of the widening fissure, objects separating from their objective particulars; poisoned coyote's yielding carcass found near the frontage road; whiskers tinctured pink of flavored prussic lapped from a shallow bowl; sound enters the body;

hammer, anvil & stirrup;
invisible but for reverberation.

August Street

Plastic hammer-crush the beetles scuttling toward cracks in the sidewalk & the last thing anyone expects is ol' man Cahill to holler from behind his screen door that the Splendid Tiger Beetles we picked from the sand boxes feed the shrikes perched in lilacs. We picked them specifically for the neighborhood time trials.

No one is late for dinner. Trains
couple in the rusting
train yard

& there—agile Splendid Tiger Beetle—as if anticipating the coming strike—~~one~~—over the plate's outside corner; steamed asparagus hanging at the plate's edge; Spode scraped with the fork's stainless prong, & atop the kitchen counter the Mason jar—steely wings against the tin lid punctured with fork holes & outside,

plastic hammers sleep
under low
branches brushing
the fir-needles—

& the hungry boy hammer strikes—~~two~~—& ol' man Cahill whisks the plate with the horse-hair brush, umpire of neighborhood competition; & inside dinner was served then finished swift down the pipe, little orb dust-thumping the leather glove—specks setting over the flattened backs of beetles—~~three~~ &

we're out
of daylight—
as the Mason jar dries
in the wood dish-rack.

Parts of A Snowman

They are watching the television; outside, snowfall in the alleys & over the gray ocean & gabled roofs—thick flakes settling, screen's dizzy blue-light against walls, light flashing from windows of the winterized homes, while children remove labels from all the movable objects, objects

they share because they have been told to share

& told to do so many things under Ms. Loy's
watchful eye—eye assuming

each picture
Michael composes suggests his emotional aura.

Ms. Loy wears eye-shadow to the coffee shop, anticipating someone of equally reckless desire.

Consider the barrista's spry breasts, nimble hands pressing together the shiny instruments, coffee-

beans—reduced
to a state of helplessness.

Beached whale
in the morning's winter light & the green-eyed boy—

buckets filled with shells—imagines the size of the whale's heart, the width of its pliable veins & where they might lead were he to crawl through—he could, you know, he could crawl through them like the sleeves on his grandfather's pea-coat.

Elementary school art is hanging in the coffee shop:
A Celebration of Winter, little figures standing on legs cut from construction paper, snow patches medley white paint & glue.

Michael has used the torn-paper technique for the arms & legs of a young boy—

body parts too unshapely for scissors, too simple for the time & energy reserved for the paper snowflakes drifting over the boy kneeling beside the paper-ocean, the silhouette of some dark-blue animal—its little eye—half-open

on the snow-covered shore.

North Shore, St. Lawrence Island

Shifting, as if over the back of a white beast whose skin opens to expose the ocean's rippled surface swarmed with polar cod—belly-up—swim bladders exploded from the rate at which the hurricane of narwhals drove them from the Arctic's echoless depths, like the prints from the young polar bear, small enough to hide in the curled toes of its mother's front paws & would, but for now—abandoned & boorish over pack-ice—the bottled sky closing behind him like the distance between predator & prey, or the space amidst the ice-floe's grinding bucklehinge; so few parts of that machine's white-vast melting in irreparable slapping against the frozen floe upon which the bear sits opening a small hole, legs extended like a child settled on the floor, fettered and waiting, for the whiskered snout of the shiny seal. Pack-ice & the turning sea beginning to lap at the ice-floes adjusting in wind, wind in the distance & then in your ear, silent wind where it enters—a shout first seen through field glasses—wind tearing through whitening ice.

Watercolor, South of Florence

They would have been olives or grapes, or opulent rows of each, spilling over the penciled-border beneath four or five cerulean strokes, cumulus loosened from the sea-dark sky, suffocated where the paper is wavy from the painter having paused to imagine the burdens of composing as needs within which things are composed; the needs within image itself, as the tree from which the paper was fashioned needed water, as the fields from which the family fed required the same; image on the surface of speech, house and hills—drought, the sun, low over the darkening length of maples, solferino roof above stucco, the single telephone pole, pontific distance from these dying fields. Someone might say he painted the image of a house, but the house was the image of the tragedy within it.

Water Works Ridge

What pains you must take for the next generation of footprints in thin mud, minute quill-pockets dazzled into the snow drifts—thin punctures bluing through bantam holes, sallow-tinged hairs around the little mouth gnawing at the pine-bark or a little coolant hose from the parked car.

Spring clouds, heavier in the still air, almost acrid & rain in silvering walls waiting in line behind silvering walls.

The hot-tub's electric hum. Little rain spatters Paterson, mottled parchment.
Clouds skiff the Water Works Ridge, the one or two hikers running to their wounded car.

Arthur Avenue

Each week, the student whose name I never remember, submits poems on lined-paper, purple-ink looped and fettered in g's and r's like fishing knots, the scratch-paper notes mother left in lunch bags before and after my first erection, my first fuck-you to Donny Maller and his soccer-field elbows, and thinking if James could fly in a giant peach, I could reach Italy through the hole I had been digging in the backyard.

How logical the unfurling of imagination, how believable the text-book sentences rolling to the edges of margins, of understanding truth-be-to-god facts of biological discovery, the lobster's sharp stream of urine from under her antennae as she approaches her lover's den;

his fickle pincers sparring until she strips her shell submitting to his flashing legs and mouth, turns on her back and the rest is historical, ancient and raw as the inch-long love darts one slug jabs into another's head in sleight-of-slug foreplay, hermaphroditic and slow, as if knowing the cold pavement would record everything in longhand.

The Ghost Boats

Come the cloud's edge
darkening in the distance & the woman crossing the river—right hand

securing her hat—the left comes the children, rain over the washed-out leaves gathering, flat-crimson,

edged ecru beneath herons, culled in budding alders. Carina: the ship's keel; Argo: its name;

ø

emerging southerly
in the night sky,
Columba Dove sent ahead of the boat navigating

the canyon's feldspar teeth;
cliffs blazed
by unaccounted wind,
wind through wood,

rock-fractured in the cuffing air,
come the dawn
through fog's
darkest margin

merged with light
over the bluing river,
canyon's gray above
the sandbar's still air—

six or seven
alders lengthening in sun;

φ

come river-steam
half-shaded, & there—

the ghost boat
drifting—empty, save
the anchor-rope,
silvering & one oar

trailing in the shallows, the prow lifting
& falling, gathering speed & rattle-restless,

ever so—so convincing itself back into existence after miles of slow water, come the current,

digging the cut-bank
bend in the river,
river unfurling, river tell
of the ship's turning

& now, days later
on the west-coast,
estuary opening,
echoless to the sky.

The dog is barking at the nothing in the space between the trees.
Spring air in afternoon windows

& the little man—little, because he is old—sits in a lawn chair at the cross-walk, lifting the chartreuse flag. Lofty intentions

& at the end of Chen's poems in Rexroth's Chinese translations, someone penciled the words family-mourning, family-mourning, family-mourning until something in the brain-reducing strayed into family-mourning, slipped left cerebrum penciling-in the desire for mugs of tea; rice-water from the sprawling patties; things to be sure of.

Three or four bumble-bees investigate the rainwater gathered on the black plastic covering the swimming pool;

crab-apples stir over algae blooms where tadpoles scurry beneath the floating vermilion orbs, the leaves—cusped & air bubbles spiraling to the surface where midges busy into a veil. Wind advises the plastic over the pool & a young man is describing to the passengers on the bus, the curve of his mare's neck, how he calms her before opening the corral.

Single obsession—breaking note in the act of finding & on-her-in-k-us...attention to some nuance, velvety buds pock the wisteria vines. Are they heavier now than when the foliage emerges?

What leads us to anticipate change?
But to impose is not to discover the infinite disclosing itself unswervingly; Oncorhynchus mykiss: steelhead ramming into the dam's concrete until blood ribbons downstream.

The dog is barking not at the nothing we walk through
from the house to the car, but veiled rabbit;

wind from the elk's spring range.
Children are navigating potholes in the cross-walk.
Even the bright metal coining in the sun says mind the man with the flags waved brightly—& we move with readiness to receive, coat-pockets emptied & the boxes we have folded from paper are filled with the nothing everywhere; volume of this moment, everything turning into what it is.

Susurrus

Cottonwoods scarred
by midnight beaver
unfinished

the bull moose
wanders in the moonlight gathered in leaves

& go beaver
the river west the highway cars bodies within occupy the space of other headlights siege some bird from the gabled roof graying beneath
the clouds unhinged & high beams upon
the wide pasture

gelding
nosing the tickle grass one after the other are the fence posts first & there last in the rain

...daylight and the back yard

Homes. In which some show of flowers And of kitchen water holds survival's Thin, thin radiance.

Modicum Blue

The koi fins quietly against the algae's domical blooms. Behind the kitchen walls, water within the water pipes.
Forsythia bird, come out from the bell-shaped flowers, breathe in time

with the koi & the tulip bulbs accelerating beneath the accelerating clouds.

Corundum: everything that shines—day & the next day. Echo: a charm of finches, how we talk to the animals.

April: a book of openings, leafless trees, silica glass & diamonds, closure in the cutting; mineral yielding & we could, couldn't we draw these diagrams with pencils colored bauxite & green, blue for the children far from disturbed by the disappearing animals—just another day in their kingdom—

horizon by which we measure where we have not yet happened.

in the winter sky—
question the one part of every sound

pinning for a different pitch.

Blackbirds lifting
as if tethered
to the same invisible will & pulling what it can from the shovels & metal things against the winterized home, the light, all of the unmoving

and the watching,
we are here

and not here—winter leaves shuffling over the sidewalk or the fescue calling itself into question—

no one knows
for certain if the world is warming. Does everything we have named

wish to be un-named?

Breathe away
the parts of yourself
you no longer require.

Larch tree yellowing on the darkening hillside; touched with fog's hollow finger; are photographs curled on the windowill, solar-absorbed, focus small & concentration bright as snowflakes

over childhood fields: & there was some lesson in my father's voice advising I finish the dinner cooling on my plate as I hoped for his failed patience, his own mind to regard the incomplete projects of our household—

the impressionable
silt of our winter psyches—

snow builds a house on black-branched foundations & our eyes lift from our drawings to the heavy flakes falling to where they are supposed to fall: none of our sketching is worth finishing.

We should pray to the people who die in their sleep;

to the starving animals;
an end to all the snow.

Come on sun, concede some shore warmed out-of-season:
the end of the cold may come next,

an order to the cold nerve endings in K's damaged foot find each other again.

Everything is compassed but the warwings, the morning light almost bright enough to say

April or the garden pond; little silver & orange fish there, orbiting the algae globe & there, black-bottomed, greening toward the surface & every now and then a gilded fish dimples what we have tried to name precisely: surface film or epithelium.

We might begin to feel that deep within our lungs are residual gills, amphibious atoms existing in the distance between the eyes, the little breaths or the range of the reaching hand's rhythm & change, space between the edges, the scale measuring a stability of minerals. Modicum is the distance between atoms & blue are their movements.

Body we fold our bodies into,
 sound separate from the moment the clapper strikes the bell, silence between the seen and the heard

bush we will say anticipate

 the river thaw or the unfinished:
useful to those expecting an end to words unending: origin;

ice enameled alder branches;
 ice gathering in the wake of my mother's footsteps say the world

 will end when a heron replaces —grain by grain—the Oregon Dunes with Virginia Beach, the heron stalking fish in the river shallows thawing, highknee on fracturing rock, highknee on rock un-serried, approaching what rocks approach before they turn to bush gravelcloud & rainstem—dirt unending as the silence we carry like rain bucketed, warmed in the sun, this breathing & the snowbush seed hibernating two-hundred years & the incomplete bodies of snowmen leaning like fence-posts edged with barbed-wire, endless in its mapping of last-names, names re-issued or where else:

 most of whom we have given to the trees as if by choice,

or this, the photograph of my mother's closed hand, skin cedaring; & modicum quiet curved from my mouth, the fog feeling toward freezing, larch needles singeing the air

unhinged—

Anything
but hushed, anything but the way the crab-apple whitens in the blazing sun, approaching through the still air & slowing & at the moment of arrival stops;

because in this,
we believe in three conceivable impacts:

one of which is none:
the whole apple

orbiting into the ivy backstop, lost to rot in the summer heat; or

apple flinched from the gasping switch, a quarter of it saucered one or two feet from the plate; or

apple shattered
into a thousand sun-lit pieces the way the boy imagined it might, were the pitch something he could handle, & it is & still is

as we imagine it there, hovering
in the wide-eyed-hold & the switch cocked & ready to scull the curved plane

in which the apple is just an apple: vermilion filling in vermilion skin, but also a circle by which the boy measures himself & to which we see them both, someday, extinguished

into soil &

turning into something
a little bit apple: modicum red,
a little bit April: body;

some corundum or echo, the space
where the koi was & now is not; how we navigate the sidewalk explaining nothing but the spring trees, the green tricycle, dismounted, the one tire still turning beneath the willow trees on the verge.

*Once someone
Put a bowl afloat
And there for all to see, for all the children, Even the New Englander
Was boatness. What I've seen
Is all I've found...*

Cape Perpetua

Underbelly of ocean, glaciated artifice, brief touchstones in the lifespan of clouds, drove of words untouched & trolled through dark water, inward reaching, says the undone self, ocean & sky expand over ebbing in the jetties, clouds folding in cold air, the inlet merge of water with saltwater, gravity of skin, somatic issue of white-surge on green surface; one wave's dissonance from another's bright curl.

This deep reaching in the belly, this looming, moan cusp and murmur, one shore removed from shore familiar, bird-song turned silence, quivered on the branch one beat after the wren takes wing. We have moved so little in our watching. The fisherman is collecting the estuary in the span of his nets, not the salt air or air heavy, not driftwood, drift-light or barnacle, but the edge of restlessness, undone seaside, boardwalk cut from Tillamook forest, whole in its ending, its never-stop water crawl, bird flit above the sand, wings glancing in sun & settling on the tidal shelves & the sky wrinkles in the shapes of worn faces, light-informed, that shuffle through estuary brine, water evolving into the glass clouds of morning, morning in the still of the weathered stones, dappled & dampened with the rain, breaking, small circlets into surface circlets expanding to shore & the next & the next small orbits—paused—our bodies become coral blooms, flora re-learning itself as shalerazor, bladescrew, some ease attempting to shape; rote in the cartography of equatorial un-raveling; become the water on which the orbits ride.
