COURSE DESCRIPTION:

Broadly speaking, philosophy involves a "second-order" or reflective approach to various areas of human inquiry. Whereas the empirical sciences (both natural and social) try to formulate laws to describe the phenomena that they observe, philosophy seeks to penetrate the appearances that give rise to these empirical laws to determine whether there is actually some deeper essence or reality that they fail to grasp -- and, if so, the nature of this deeper essence or reality.

In this course, which is a general overview of the western philosophical tradition, we shall consider six areas that, historically, have been the subject of philosophical inquiry: 1) the fundamental nature of reality (metaphysics); 2) whether this reality includes God, and the relation between religious belief, on the one hand, and human reason and evil, on the other (religion); 3) the nature of our knowledge and its relation to reality (epistemology); 4) the nature of "the self," i.e., whether there is some aspect of who we are that is essential to our identity (self-identity); 5) whether we are free, and therefore responsible for our actions, or merely determined like all other objects in the natural world (freedom); and 6) whether there is conduct that is innately "good," and whether human beings are capable of it (ethics). (If time permits, we shall also consider questions of justice and their relation to arguments for the legitimacy of the state).

COURSE REQUIREMENTS AND EVALUATION:

The reading assignments for this course are, for the most part, only 20-40 pages per week, but they are difficult. You should therefore read the materials once before coming to class and at least once afterwards.

Your evaluation for the course will be based upon three tests, each of which will be worth one third of your final grade. Tentatively, the tests are scheduled for Thursday, October 4, Thursday, November 8, and Thursday December 13. I do, however, reserve the right to reschedule the tests (with at least one week advance notice) if we do not move through the materials at a speed that conforms to the schedule below.

POLICIES:

Unless evidence of emergency or serious illness is provided, make-up tests will not be arranged.
