Course Content

This course surveys political science research on American Politics. It is intended to introduce students to classic texts and contemporary debates. I assume that you are familiar with the basic principles and institutions of American politics and our goal is to deepen your understanding of political science research on American politics.

Part of the course is also familiarizing you with the practice of political science—formulating questions, framing research plans, gathering data, and analyzing. As part of the class, we will analyze federal appropriations bills. These annual spending bills provide an excellent basis for understanding the relationship between public opinion, parties, and institutions. As part of this project you will learn how to use Excel (hence the two homework assignments) and make a presentation to the class using Powerpoint. This effort culminates in a research paper analyzing the federal appropriations process for a specific year.

In addition, you are responsible for preparing a summary of each week's reading and e-mailing it to me by midnight before class. I will begin each class by asking randomly selected students to summarize the readings.
