Content
This course analyzes the role of parties in American democracy. Parties are ubiquitous in our politics—recruiting and financing candidates, organizing coalitions, and promoting cooperation in government. Yet parties are hard to define and their effects are hard to measure. Thus this class seeks to define parties, identify their functions, and trace their influence. To accomplish these goals, this course develops a theoretical framework for understanding parties as cooperative solutions to basic democratic problems. As a countervailing view, we discuss the normative view that parties should be "responsible." We trace the history of American parties and their current status to understand variation in party strength, and the relationship between strong parties and responsible parties.

Required Texts
A collection of supplemental readings is available on reserve at Mansfield Library. Also, I may send e-mails linking you to relevant news items.

Student Behavior
Students are required to read all assigned readings and bring them to class, attend all lectures, participate in class, take a midterm and final, and complete a research paper. Students are expected to avoid profanity, to turn off cell phones, and to arrive on time. While we will be discussing contemporary politics, students should avoid simple proselytizing or provocation.

The grade breakdown is:
Participation: 10%
Midterm: 20%
Paper: 40%
Final: 30%

Papers are due at the start of class. Late papers are docked a full grade for each day late. Students may schedule a make-up exam with documentation if illness or family death prevents attendance at the midterm. No excuses will be accepted for late papers; students are responsible for beginning their papers early, avoiding computer problems, and getting papers to me in a timely fashion.

Students are expected to do their own work. Students must cite sources used to write their papers. Plagiarism will be punished in accordance with university policy.

Students taking PS 300 or PS 400 in conjunction with this class, or graduate students, will write an additional paper analyzing the 2006 Congressional elections.
