Content

This course analyzes the role of interest groups in American democracy. As citizens, we are nominally equal. Our votes count the same and we have the same rights to freedom of speech, assembly and petition. Yet some of us utilize those rights more than others. Subsets of citizens (or corporations) band together to advance common political interests. This class studies the behavior of these organized groups. How do they form? What conditions favor the development of interest groups, and when would we not expect to see groups form? How do interest groups influence policy formulation? How do interest groups influence elections? Which groups ally themselves with a political party? This class will address these questions...and more.

Required Texts

- Analyzing Interest Groups by Scott Ainsworth, available at the bookstore
 - A collection of supplemental readings is on reserve at Mansfield library
- also, I may send e-mails linking you to relevant news items

Student Behavior

Students are required to read all assigned readings and bring them to class, attend all lectures, participate in class, take a midterm and final, and complete a research paper. Students are expected to avoid profanity, to turn off cell phones, and to arrive on time. While we will be discussing contemporary politics, students should avoid simple proselytizing or provocation.

The grade breakdown is:

Participation:	20%
Midterm:	20%
Paper:	30%
Final:	30%

Papers are due at the start of class. Late papers are docked a full grade for each day late. Students may schedule a make-up exam with documentation if illness or family death prevents attendance at the midterm. No excuses will be accepted for late papers; students are responsible for beginning their papers early, avoiding computer problems, and getting papers to me in a timely fashion.

Students are expected to do their own work. Students must cite sources used to write their papers. Plagiarism will be punished in accordance with university policy.

Students taking PS 300 or PS 400 in conjunction with this class, or graduate students, will write an additional paper analyzing an interest group in light of course texts.
