Ramirez would trim state government to fund universities

By STEPHANIE HANSON
Montana Kaimin Reporter

Montana's universities are underfunded and a new formula is needed to change the inadequacies, Republican gubernatorial candidate Jack Ramirez said at the University of Montana last night.

However, he said, Montanans should not see an increase in taxes to meet those additional requests for increased funding.

Ramirez answered questions from an audience of about 80 people at the Women's Center.

The state's "top-heavy" administrative branch should be trimmed, releasing money that could be for university funding, Ramirez said.

He suggested that the operation of the Homestead Relief Act, which costs the state possibly as much as $450,000, be eliminated. The money saved from the "low-priority" operation could then be applied to funding for the university system, he said.

Ramirez said that he was "puzzled" that past efforts by the Legislature to increase funding for the Montana University System's budget have not resulted in increased salaries for faculty.

Ramirez also said that the coal severance tax trust fund should be considered as a source of funding for special building or water projects in Montana.

Those projects are "tangible" investments that show a better dollar return for the state, rather than investing in bonds, he said.

The proposed fine arts building for UM is a possible candidate for those funds, Ramirez said. However, he said that he will have to examine the funding of the proposed project before he decides whether to lobby for the building's construction.

Ramirez, who is running against Democrat Ted Schwinden, was a lawyer in Billings for 12 years before being elected to the state House of Representatives in 1976.

Ramirez, whose call for a special legislative session failed last week, still believes that a special session is needed after the November election to battle the "tremendous impact" that the Anaconda Co.'s closure would have in Anaconda and Great Falls.

The state must become actively involved in obtaining economic aid for these cities, such as providing low-interest loans for small businessmen and retraining and relocation programs for unemployed workers, he said.

Ramirez also said that Montana needs to encourage new industry by reducing regulatory "red tape" and the "excessive" tax burden on businesses.

There is "no inherent evil" in out-of-state businesses coming to Montana, Ramirez said. Montana needs to remove tax penalties for out-of-state industries and remove "unreasonable" regulatory procedures that delay, and possibly prohibit, new industry from coming to Montana. However, he said, it is important that new industry is "clean," citing as an example the American Dental Manufacturing Co. in Missoula. "We are not an island unto ourselves," he said.

Baucus hears support for coal tax

By MICHAEL CRATER
Montana Kaimin Reporter

Witnesses at Sen. Max Baucus' hearing in Missoula yesterday gave him plenty of ammunition to use against congressional proposals to override state authority in energy matters.

Baucus, D-Mont., came seeking support for his opposition to a proposed Energy Mobilization Board, which would enable some energy projects to override state and local laws. He also opposes any congressional limit on state energy-resource taxes. Montana's 30 percent coal severance tax is a primary target of the limitation proposal.

Congressional advocates of the proposals suggest they are necessary to help this country end its dependence on foreign energy sources. They say the coal tax is too high and discourages utilities from burning coal, and that the EMB can cut unnecessary red tape and speed up energy-production permits.

None of the witnesses at Baucus' Senate Judiciary Committee hearing favored either proposal.

Marjorie Harper, president of the Clark Fork Valley Protective Association, took issue with the EMB's proposed function of cutting red tape. If red tape is to be cut, she said, "why not cut the red tape of due process, the red tape of access to the courts, and the red tape of life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness?"

Harper and other witnesses agreed with Baucus that the EMB might be unconstitutional. It would force states to speed up consideration of energy projects, they said, and cut access to the courts because one provision would mandate that all appeals of EMB actions be made to courts in Washington, D.C.

Even if constitutional, the EMB proposal is "unworkable, outrageous, silly, short-sighted and poorly conceived," Montana Attorney General Mike Greely told Baucus.

Most of Greely's statements were directed toward the proposed limitation on state coal taxes. He said Montana's 30 percent coal severance tax is a "farsighted and effective means" of dealing with the costs of coal production.

Coal production costs are hard to calculate, he said, "because we don't know what will happen down the road." For this reason, he explained, half of the coal tax revenues are put into a trust fund for "costs that occur long after the development takes place."

Referring to recent closure of the copper smelter in Anaconda, Greely said, "Montana has seen the devastation that mineral production can create."

Greely also said Montana's coal tax costs energy consumers in other states less than their own sales taxes. His most dramatic example was Michigan, where he said the coal tax adds a dime a month to the average utility bill, while the state's sales tax adds $10.22.

He called it "ironic" that states which "endure none of the costs of producing the coal," yet profit so much from it, would attack Montana's tax.

Greely said the tax doesn't prevent or restrain coal development, as demonstrated by the fact that coal production in Montana

UM Foundation move fails to allay neighborhood fears

By ALAN ROSENBERG
Montana Kaimin Reporter

The University of Montana Foundation and Office of Development will be moving into an on-campus home at 600 University Ave. later this week.

However, some residents of the 600 blocks of Evans and Beckwith avenues who protested a proposed move of the foundation last spring into the university-owned home at 667 E. Beckwith Ave., say that though they are pleased by the move, their problems with UM have yet to be resolved.

The new quarters will provide much-needed space for the foundation, according to Allan Vannini, director of the UM Foundation and Office of Development.

The new facility provides almost four times more space than the current office in Main Hall.

The house, most recently used by the religious studies department, has been vacant since the beginning of Fall Quarter 1979.

Until last week, the house had been intended for use by administrative offices housed in the Lodge, according to David Weber, a member of last year's space subcommittee of the Campus Development Committee.

During the last year, Weber explained, the committee studied space requirements of those campus offices seeking space.

However, in the last few weeks it became obvious that none of the administrative offices had enough money in their budgets to make the move, Weber said.

When the plans of other units to move fell through, the space was offered to the UM Foundation.

Last week UM President Richard Bowers accepted the space committee recommendation to move the foundation.

Last spring, Bowers decided to move the foundation and the development office to a residence at 667 E. Beckwith Ave. Both offices raise money for UM.

The proposal ran into opposition from neighbors, as well as Mayor Bill Cregg, who argued the move would violate city zoning laws. The property is now zoned for residential use.

Some students upset with Gideons

By STEVE STÜEBNER
Montana Kaimin Reporter

Twenty-eight men with confident smiles were interspersed around campus yesterday distributing little green New Testaments, and some students felt a bit perturbed after being approached time and time again.

Melinda Sinistro felt like she was "harassed." The sophomore in zoology and journalism was so outraged that she drafted a petition to put a stop to the spreading of religious literature on campus.

Sinistro collected 55 signatures on her petition and also had people respond to a questionnaire she drafted. The question receiving the most comment was "How many times were you approached with religious books today?" One student was approached 14 times and others responded with "innumerable." The rest of her figures regarding this question averaged out to five encounters with the men.

The men are members of Gideons International, a group of Christian business and professional men. Their appearance at UM was sponsored by Campus Crusade for Christ. Permission for the men's presence was granted by Patricia Douglas, vice president of fiscal affairs.

"If these guys were Hare Krishnas," Sinistro said, "the administration would have a cow."

About 3,900 New Testaments were handed out, according to Carl Bailey, Missoula Gideons member. He added that the practice of distributing Bibles in Montana began in 1908 in what was called Iron Mountain, Mont., where 25 were placed in the Superior Hotel.

Campus distribution drives are common to universities all over the world, Bailey said, adding that Gideons will be on the Montana State University campus tomorrow.

"I wouldn't object to them if they were stationary," Sinistro said, "but they're all over the place! All these little men with little smiles—that's what made them so obnoxious."

Sinistro added that she would take her petition to the administration tomorrow.

Read all about your candidate

You say you don't know who to vote for this Nov. 4? Or even who is running in your legislative district?

Well, fret no more.

Beginning today, the Montana Kaimin is running a daily series on state House of Representatives and Senate races in Missoula. The stories, written by students in a senior-level public affairs reporting cases, will cover House districts 93, 95, 96, 98, 99 and 100, and Senate districts 49 and 50.

The candidates in House districts 94 (Dan Kemmis) and 97 (Steve Waldron) are running unopposed.

Today the candidates for House District 93, Republican Ben Hanson and Democrat Carol Mitchell.

Fine arts plan could renew Beckwith feud

At long last the University of Montana Foundation and Office of Development has a home.

After almost two years of searching, scheming and stirring up feuds with UM's neighbors, the organization is moving its fund-raising, public relations effort from one on-campus location to another. UM's angry neighbors to the south, the residents of the 600 block of East Beckwith Avenue, no longer have to worry that UM will invade their locality—not to mention violate city zoning laws—by moving the foundation office's into the area.

UM has side-stepped what could have been a divisive and messy situation. Or has it?

In this game of moving madness, hostilities appear destined to break out next with the Beckwith residents over a proposal to move the three offices on Eddy Avenue into the three houses UM owns on Beckwith Avenue if funding for the fine arts building is approved by the 1981 Legislature.

As if the fine arts building won't have enough trouble being built.

The Board of Regents has already angered legislators by allocating planning funds for a radio-tv building at MSU before a review of programs there and at UM was completed. Several legislators have said the state simply cannot afford new buildings at MSU and UM—especially if the building at UM would also house radio-tv facilities. It's not too far-fetched to assume that the hassle between the regents and the legislators will delay the fine arts building another two years.

Support for the building does exist. UM has worked hard for it, and it probably will eventually be built on Eddy Avenue. But what's the point if two years from now the university will again be fighting with the Beckwith residents over moving the Eddy Avenue office into their neighborhood?

Once again, it's an example of the university's ineptness at communication and planning.

Last week, Academic Vice President Donald Habbe discussed with department heads the possibility of moving the Eddy Avenue offices, but said a decision won't be made until UM knows if the fine arts building will be constructed. Makes sense. But why even mention or consider moving those offices to Beckwith Avenue when it will: 1) ultimately result in a lawsuit with the neighbors over whether the university must abide by city zoning laws and not move its offices into an area zoned for residential use, and 2) further anger the Beckwith-area residents—seven of whom are UM faculty members.

It would be stupid for the university to sell the three houses it owns on Beckwith Avenue. Even stupider would be considering moving the Eddy Avenue offices into the neighborhood. The houses are now rented to families. Why not keep it that way until the time comes that UM can acquire the entire block? At least then it will be playing musical offices on a block it owns.

Enough damage was done by the aborted plan to move the Foundation offices. Let's hope the UM administration is smart enough to learn a lesson in communication and avoid further tactical errors that succeed only in making us the bad guy.

Chinese first

Editor: In regard to an announcement in the Oct. 17 issue of the Kaimin, I would like to point out a misuse of word (or concept) which is frequently made, even in major newspapers. The news was about a group of students from Taiwan and the heading was "Taiwanese dancers to perform here," and in the body of the news, the term Taiwanese was used throughout as the adjective for those students.

Why wasn't the adjective Chinese used instead? After all, they are Chinese first, as Americans think of themselves as Americans first, then Montanans or Marylanders, as the case may be. Some people may be aware of the political situation between the People's Republic of China and the Republic of China and do not want to offend the former, but the term Taiwanese is not only unacceptable to the government in Taipei, but also is an anathema to the government in Peking.

Furthermore, people from Taiwan are not necessarily Taiwanese, some may be Cantonese, some Hunanese etc. (The various distinctions in Chinese are not based on where they live or have lived, but based on ancestry. Thus a Cantonese is a Cantonese even though he or she generations before him has long moved to live in other place.) Thus when referring to where they are from, it is alright to use Taiwan, but when referring to people, please use Chinese.

Fine Arts supported

Editor: The Environmental Studies Program and the other units located in the 700 block of Eddy Avenue support the construction of a new fine arts building in that block. The Kaimin story of October 16, in which our natural concern for the welfare of the students in Environmental Studies and Native American Studies and for the academic integrity of those programs was voiced, should not be misconstrued. The University of Montana has an exceptionally fine Drama-Dance department but has atrocious facilities for their programs. The need for a new building is clear.

Equally clear is the need to plan for adequate space for displaced programs. Such planning would include consultation with the affected programs and has not yet occurred.

Forego common cents

Editor: I attended a meeting of concerned citizens. We, being mostly college students, account for little voice in actions of others. But listen all you middle-class people, if you wish to keep breathing safely on this earth, if you wish to avoid the bubonic (cancer) plague, you'd better vote for initiatives 84 and 87.

1984 is around the corner, do we die or do we deny?

Big business is a lie; you die, and they no cry.

As the man says in the Kaimin (Oct. 16), we either join bonds together or we perish, not create new government, but a new consciousness, and the government will follow suit.

This election, show the candidates that you are tired of mediocrity. Tell them you want a human being for a leader, or no leader at all.

No, not even for Anderson; the difference between him and Carter is four years in the White House.

We must quit chasing dreams of superiority and pray to whomever for common sense, not common cents.

I wish to be able to raise a child without a gas mask.

Some scientists think that in event of nuclear war the ozone layer will be so damaged that, like slugs and moles, the cold, damp ground will be our hole of safety.

So remember, Russia's middle class believes in their system. Maybe you torries are standing too close to the source of the evil to see it.

Better ways to register?

Are you tired of waiting in lines to be sectioned into classes? There are other alternatives that would benefit both the university and the students. Read on!

Sectioning literally means admitting students into class. This is accomplished by either people, i.e. faculty (as is presently done) or machine, i.e. computer. There are also two classifications of registration — advanced or pre-registration and not advanced or, simply, registration. This gives four options for registering students into classes: 1.) registration by faculty sectioning (present system), 2.) registration by computer sectioning, 3.) pre-registration by faculty and 4.) pre-registration by computer.

There are some positive and negative points to each option. Pre-registration offers more time for faculty advising and schedule planning, more time for analyzing data to determine, for example, for which class there is a higher demand, and also more time for vacations. However, many students change majors and/or classes by the time classes start and drop/add forms increase (about 100 percent).

Computer sectioning, besides easing the workload on the faculty, provides a "demand analysis" of the classes. This enables the administration and department chairman to know which departments need more or have too many faculty and which classes need more sections to accommodate the students' needs. With faculty sectioning accurate "demand analysis" is not available, because if a student does not get his first choice he'll make a second or third choice, which may not be what he really needs or wants. With faculty sectioning, however, students find out what they are taking right away and the system has a more personalized touch.

Not-advanced, computer registration can run into problems if the computer breaks down due to the work load. Also, though a "demand analysis" would be available, there would not be enough time to study it and make the necessary changes.

If computer registration were used at the University of Montana, the students would fill out their requested registration forms and hand them in to the registrar or advisers. These forms could then be run through the computer for the purpose of obtaining a "demand analysis." The department chairmen could then use this "demand analysis" to determine what changes could be made in the class schedule to accommodate most of the student's needs. After these changes are entered into the computer, the student's registration forms would then be run through the computer again and the actual sectioning would take place.

Mitchell, Hanson both seek higher university funding

Editor's note: This is the first article of an eight-part series on Missoula-area legislative candidates.

By DON LEWIS
Contributing Reporter

No matter who wins the District 93 race for the Montana House of Representatives, the Montana university system will apparently win a vote of support.

Both Carol Mitchell, the Democratic candidate, and B. T. "Ben" Hanson, the Republican candidate, said in recent interviews that they will strongly support increased funding for higher education. They agree that the place to start is to change the 19:1 student-faculty ratio that determines universities' funding.

Mitchell, a Missoula attorney, said the current ratio "just doesn't work" because it is based on enrollment, which fluctuates each year. Like Mitchell, Hanson said the ratio should be changed, but neither candidate had any suggestions.

The candidates differ on whether one of Montana's six units in the university system should be cut.

Hanson, who supports eliminating Western Montana College in Dillon, said, "I'd rather see us support a few outstanding units" than many underfunded ones. He added that he supports "quality rather than quantity" in education.

Mitchell said she favors community-organized education, such as community colleges, but that she does not know if a unit should be cut.

Both candidates agree that duplication of programs in the university system should be minimized. Mitchell suggested that special programs, such as a master's program in business, should be consolidated at one school.

The candidates also agree that faculty at Montana universities should get a raise, although they did not know how much of a raise.

Hanson, who retired as superintendent of Missoula's District 1 schools a year ago, suggested that money from Montana's 30 percent coal severance tax be reallocated so that the university system and public schools get more money. Fifty percent of the money the tax brings in is spent and the rest is put in a trust fund. The candidates agree that the trust fund should remain intact.

Both candidates said the trust fund's interest, which the state can spend, should be reinvested in Montana to stimulate business and create jobs. Most of this money is now invested out-of-state, where that state can get a higher return on its investments.

Mitchell suggested the state should focus on attracting industry that is compatible with timber and agriculture industries. Hanson said the state should research the methods used by New England states to stimulate the economy when industry pulled out a few years ago. He said factories and mills left New England for better conditions in Southern states, but that New England attracted new business and recovered. Both suggested tax incentives and low-interest loans to draw new business to Montana.

The 35-year-old Mitchell said if elected she would support a resolution from the Montana Legislature to the U.S. Congress calling for no federal intervention on the coal severance tax and asking for the Bonneville Power Administration to follow the Major Facility Siting Act.

Hanson, 61, also said he would support legislation protecting the environment and making industry's use of resources more selective.

On another issue, the BPA's proposed power lines that may run through much of District 93, including the Rattlesnake and Grant Creek areas, Mitchell and Hanson agree that the BPA should be required to comply with the Montana Major Facility Siting Act.

Hanson, who lives at 3015 Martinwood Road, said he wants the BPA to put the lines "where they will not hurt development" and suggested that the power lines be built "up on a hillside" away from homes and other development.

Mitchell, who lives in the upper

Grant Creek area, said the State Board of Lands should require the BPA to comply with the Major Facility Siting Act as a condition of crossing state land. She added that the BPA should have to bury the lines in residential areas.

One issue that the candidates disagree on is decriminalization of or reducing penalties of current marijuana laws. Hanson said the marijuana laws are "adequate," but Mitchell said she thinks the law should be rewritten so that possession of small amounts of marijuana is not a felony.

She said that courts in Montana's larger cities are not prosecuting people for possession of small amounts. However, she said she would not introduce legislation for decriminalization.

Both Hanson and Mitchell said they would like to see the state's social services, such as food stamps and child abuse programs, evaluated to determine if they are really needed and used. In addition, they both said that there would not be enough money to increase services.

House District 93 surrounds part of Missoula, including the Grant Creek area, the Rattlesnake area, Pattee Canyon and the area east of Missoula as far as Clinton. Parts of the district, the Grant Creek area for example, have been annexed by the city.

Although the candidates seem to agree on most of the issues, and although they have both spent about $1,500 on their campaign so far, Hanson said he would be a better legislator because he has "more time to devote" to the job because he is retired and has more "useful experience." He was a Navy administrator for 21 years before entering the education field.

Mitchell, however, said that her job as an attorney leaves her with flexible hours and that she works with Montana laws every day. She also said she has been involved with "improving state government" for 15 years through lobbying efforts. Mitchell spent the last two legislative sessions lobbying for Common Cause, she said, and for four sessions she has lobbied for women's rights and domestic issues.

Tomorrow's story will focus on the candidates for House District 95, Democrat Ann Mary Dussault and Republican Marilyn Fernelius.

New student lobbyists chosen

By GREG GADBERRY
Montana Kaimin Reporter

When Montana's state legislators converge on Helena next January for the 1981 legislative session, they'll find Steve Carey and Mike Dahlem waiting there to lobby them.

Last Thursday, Carey, 24, and Dahlem, 27, were selected by ASUM's Legislative Committee to serve as ASUM's student lobbyists.

The two men were chosen from a field of three candidates, following a series of Legislative Committee hearings.

The third candidate for the positions was Dorothy Simpson, 43, a junior in business administration.

Both Carey and Dahlem boast past experience in working with the state Legislature.

Carey, who now acts as chairman of the Legislative Committee, served in 1979 as an intern for Rep. Daniel Kemmis, D-Missoula.

Dahlem served a previous term as ASUM lobbyist during the 1979 legislative session.

"As an intern, I learned a great deal about the legislative process," Carey said, "and about the University's place in that process. To me, this job is the natural extension of that experience."

While both new lobbyists admit to being eager about their jobs, they said that a lot of work awaits them in Helena.

"Lobbying involves both listening and testifying," Dahlem said. "Not only do you testify to individual legislators, but you also speak before various committees on issues."

And the major issue, both agree, is money. "We want to get our fair share," Dahlem said. "And we have to keep working to get it."

But lawmakers are not always easy to find, Dahlem said.

"You spend time meeting informally with legislators, in restaurants, in the bars, in the halls," he said. You have to find out just what issues legislators are supporting, and why."

But before heading for Helena to buttonhole representatives, Carey and Dahlem must first work on a slate of issues important to the students.

"We decide on issues by first taking a survey of the student body," Carey said. "That survey will probably be taken in November. We ask students what issues they think are important, including environmental issues, political issues and educational issues."

Following the survey, the Legislative Committee decides what issues should take priority during that session, Carey said.

Once student lobbyists arrive in Helena, Dahlem said, they stay tied to the Legislative Committee by making reports.

"When I was a lobbyist in 1979," Dahlem said, "I called here once a day to report on progress."

But what does a lobbyist get for a session's worth of work?

According to the approved budget request for this year, the lobbyist's services are worth $4,000, plus travel expenses.

This means that Carey and Dahlem will split the money down the middle . . . maybe.

Apparently, the Legislative Committee is working on a plan to increase the salary.

The plan, however, must first be okayed by the ASUM Budget and Finance Committee and then Central Board.

Tennis squads ready for spring action

By PAT SULLIVAN
Montana Kaimin Sports Editor

There are plenty of outdoor sports suited perfectly to the coming snow of a Montana winter, but tennis is certainly not one of them.

So although both the men and women's University of Montana tennis coaches have finalized their squads, the long winter postpones any serious competition until spring.

"Weather is the plight of the UM tennis athlete," men's coach Larry Gianchetta said. "It's hard to recruit people to come to UM because of the short season."

Gianchetta has established a strength ladder after the short fall tennis season with the top six players being Pat Luebstorf, Saul Chessin, Jim Knofler, Dan Craig, Mark Doty and Jay Lauer.

The final six players are Matt Ricketts, Cal Larson, Tim Alley, Bill Perrin, Paul Weber and Greg Sprunk.

Women's coach Julie Garcia has listed her squad, in no particular strength order, as Denise Albrecht, Bonnie Brown, Jane Heintzman, Tammi Milligan, Cathy McDonnell, Birgitte Gjaever, Laurie Pettit and Lynanne Otto.

Gianchetta hopes to arrange two tennis matches during the winter at indoor courts in Spokane and Bozeman, but no date is firm yet.

UM and Idaho State are the only two schools in the Big Sky conference without some kind of indoor tennis courts.

Both Garcia and Gianchetta said they would even be lucky to schedule two home matches in the spring because of unpredictable Montana weather.

Missoula will host the Division I regional competition for the Northwest College Women's Sports Association the weekend of May 9. The men's regionals are set for April 24 in Boise.

Women's rugby a social sport in Missoula

The grunts and groans of rugby competition will soon be replaced with the snowy winter winds, but the University of Montana Women's Rugby Club will continue their practice indoors until the spring sun appears.

The women's club has had several games this fall, but their main rugby matches will be in March, April and May.

The Missoula team, which was the first women's rugby squad in Montana, competes with established teams from Pocatello, Boise, Moscow, Seattle, Spokane and Portland.

The UM club will also have matches with new rugby clubs formed in Kalispell, Billings, Bozeman, Great Falls and Helena, along with several Canadian teams.

Spring tournaments that the team plans to attend include the Missoula Maggotfest in April, the Seattle Mudbowl in March and the Rocky Mountain Women's Classic in Denver.

The club conducts fund raisers throughout the year to help with their travel expenses. They were budgeted $700 by ASUM.

The women train for the sport in the Men's Gym during the winter, as opposed to teams in warmer climates which can practice outside year round.

Members of the UM Women's Rugby Club are President Sue Ferrara, Captain Ro Loos, Treasurer Laura Morse and secretary Lana Lietch.

Other squad members are Shelly Nixon, Lisa Lietch, Kitty Orman, Lisa Crone, Connie Brown, Chris Hicks, Holly Driggs and Tina Reinke.

Completing the squad are Danni Steiner, Cathy Newsheller, Jonda Bink, Deborah Moravec, Alice Ramos, Jodi Mason, Zella Downing and Barb Slott.

Thinclads win Eastern Washington meet

By RENATA BIRKENBUEL
Montana Kaimin Contributing Reporter

The University of Montana women's cross country team posted a first place finish at the Eastern Washington Invitational in Spokane last weekend by defeating six other teams.

Coach Dick Koontz said the Grizzlies ran as a pack within the top six teams although the course was "not conducive to good times because of a lot of hills and corners."

Bridgette Baker won the individual title with a time of 19:28 and Jill Warner came in second at 20:07. Other Grizzly finishers included: Linda Becker, Julie Glenn, Mary Reimers, and Louise Bruce.

The Grizzlies have two new runners on their roster, Katie Fontana and Mary Kuehn.

With a 27-point spread between the University of Montana and Montana State, the Grizzly men's cross country team routed the Bobcats for first place in an eleven team meet at the Eastern Washington Invitational on Saturday.

UM took overall honors with 43 points, followed by MSU with 70 and Eastern Washington with 75.

Montana was led by Dave Gordon, who placed second with 25:11 over the 10,000 meter course. Kevin Dilley came in eighth for the Grizzlies with a 26:05 clocking. Brian Turner finished 10th, Mike Brady 11th and Greg Downing 12th. Paul Williams, Pat Allen and Bruce Browning finished further back to complete the team victory.

The Grizzlies travel to Boise, for another 10,000 meter race, at the Boise State Invitational meet this weekend.

Water reservation sought for Clark Fork

By MICHAEL CRATER
Montana Kaimin Reporter

The Montana Department of Fish, Wildlife and Parks is seeking to reserve some Clark Fork River water for in-stream flow.

In-stream flow reservations are used to prevent rivers from being totally dried up by water users. This protects downstream users, fish and wildlife populations and water quality, Bill Thomas, information officer for the department, said Wednesday.

Thomas said the reservation would affect the river from its headwaters near Warm Springs to Bonner, east of Missoula. The reservation would legally require that there be a certain amount of water in the river; if the level becomes too low, upstream water users with the most recent claims would have to curtail their consumption.

He said the reservation process would probably take from five to eight years to complete and was started about a year ago. The department, as well as other government agencies, is studying the river now, he said.

Subjects of the studies include recreational use of the river, seasonal flow characteristics, thermal characteristics, and especially the relationship between water quantity and quality in the river.

The first time the department requested an in-stream reservation was about 12 years ago, for the Yellowstone River, and the process took most of a decade. Thomas said he expects the Clark Fork River reservation to be less controversial, mostly because there are fewer industries and individuals seeking new water rights.

Thomas said he did not expect the hearing process to be "as lengthy and involved" this time because "I don't see the tremendous conflicts the Yellowstone had," he said.

Hearings on the application for in-stream flow reservation will be held by the Montana Board of Natural Resources, probably in about five years, he said. At that point, public input will be "very important," he added. "It is a public decision because it is a public resource."

Thomas urged citizens to "familiarize themselves with the situation on the Clark Fork" and with the need for a flow reservation, and said that his office will do its best to "keep the public informed as to the things we're doing and why we're doing them."

Baucus . . .

has increased each year since the tax was enacted. In 1979, he said, production increased "a whopping 31 percent." And he said 250 million tons of Montana coal will soon be mined to fulfill the largest coal contract in history.

Greely said a federal limit on taxes "is totally without precedent" and would destroy "the single most essential facet of a state's sovereignty, the power to tax."

Baucus agreed, saying the limit would set "a pernicious precedent very significantly limiting the ability of the state to operate." If the proposal passes, he said, the states "are going to have to go to the federal government for a hand-out."

Helena attorney Roger Tippy told Baucus the federal government can't be relied on to provide the money the state would lose without the coal tax.

Tippy gave the example of $15 million accumulated from the coal tax for highway improvement. He said federal matching funds were expected, which would have amounted to an additional $45 million. The money would have been used to upgrade 11 roads in eastern Montana to support the traffic caused by coal development there.

But the federal Department of Transportation denied the funding request, he said, so only one of the roads got fixed.

Tippy said this was one case in which the coal tax revenues needed to be redistributed, but because of the "siege mentality" caused by congressional threats against the coal tax, "this sort of tinkering will be done," he said.

Ted Doney, director of Montana's Department of Natural Resources, also spoke at the hearing. He mostly talked about the EMB proposal, which he said erred by assuming that most energy-project delays are caused by state agencies. Actually, he claimed, the federal government causes more delays with its

"cumbersome bureaucracy."

"State agencies, because we're lean, can process things a lot quicker," he said. An example was the Colstrip expansion project, which he said the federal bureaucracy took three and a half years longer than the state to permit.

Improved their process to the point where they're keeping up with the state," he added.

Incomplete and misleading applications for permits also "have certainly been part of the cause, in the past a majority of the cause" of delays, he said.

If the EMB passes, Doney said, it is likely that in these cases the federal board would demand a decision "while the state was still waiting for a satisfactory application."

But these days, he said, "corporations have begun to play by the rules" and understand that if they submit proper applications they will receive "reasonably quick" decisions. Nothing could be gained by changing the system now, he argued.

But Baucus warned against expecting other states to respect Montana's authority. "They want our coal, they want our resources and frankly, they don't care what they have to do to get it," he said.

Office move . . .

between residents and the university appeared ended when Bowers announced that the university was interested in acquiring the Federal Credit Union building at 800 E. Beckwith Ave.

At the time, Bowers suggested selling the Beckwith Avenue property to raise money to buy the credit union. The university also owns two other houses on the block at 655 and 619 E. Beckwith Ave.

When informed of the impending move, several Beckwith and Evans avenues residents expressed their approval of the decision, but added that the possibility of UM moving offices into the Beckwith Avenue houses remained.

Gera Goode, a spokeswoman for the residents, said that though she was "delighted" by the move, the problem would not be solved until the university sold all three of the houses.

Scholarships

Two recently created scholarships offered by the University of Montana Foundation are now up for grabs, and award money for the recipients will be handed out later this quarter.

The Alan Boyer scholarship of $1,000 goes to an "outstanding student," and the VanBramer scholarship will go to a student from Yellowstone County. The amount of money for the VanBramer scholarship has yet to be determined.

Deadline for both scholarships is Nov. 1, and the foundation encourages faculty or fellow friends to nominate prospective students.

Applicants must apply in the Financial Aids Office in the Lodge.
