Dress code angers admissions workers

By JEANETTE HORTICK
Montana Kaimin Reporter

Several employees of the University of Montana Admissions Office are unhappy with a new dress code in their office which they say the management has no right to impose without collective bargaining.

On November 3, Acting Director of the Admissions Office James Royan and Paula Meiers, systems coordinator, sent a memo to Admissions Office employees regarding new guidelines and practices for the office.

Part of the memo stated: "It is expected that employees will present an attractive appearance, which reflects the professional nature of the office."

There was no mention in the memo forbidding employees from wearing blue jeans. But, according to employees and Meiers, the employees were given verbal notice by Royan that blue jeans were unacceptable.

Royan, who is out of town this

Speaking for management, Meiers said, "We feel this is a professional format and we feel they should dress professionally." The code implies that blue jeans are unacceptable, she said.

"We prefer they didn't wear blue jeans," she said. But, she added, employees may wear corduroys and women are not required to wear skirts and men do not have to wear ties.

The employees are upset with this code, Kris Roby, president of UM's chapter of the MPEA, said. It was an arbitrary action by the Admissions Office management, she said.

She added that there is no provision in the union contract allowing management to dictate how employees dress.

Jerry Brown, staff representative of MPEA, said it was the association's position to determine dress code, not the management's.

Since the dress code is not in the contract, Roby said she told employees to ignore the code until a decision was made.

In a letter to Jerry Brown, Lynda Brown, director of the Equal Employment Opportunity and Personnel Office, said the Admissions Office policy was "reasonable and within our management prerogative."

Brown said she had consulted with George Mitchell, UM legal counsel, and that they recommended MPEA raise the issue at the next bargaining meeting. In the meantime, she and Mitchell would allow the dress code to be enforced, Brown said.

Roby said she dislikes the dress code because it involves a cost factor — if employees are required to dress professionally they should be given an allowance to buy new clothes.

The whole matter is "ridiculous and reminds me of the times of high school dress codes," Roby said.

Admissions Office employee Janice Midyett said the majority of employees are "not very happy"

What if ferrets became extinct?

Non-game animals debated

By MICHAEL CRATER
Montana Kaimin Reporter

If some of Montana's non-game species become extinct, rancher

Joe Helle asked last night, "is that so drastic?"

Helle's remarks came in response to suggestions that Montana must study its non-game species — the little animals nobody hunts or knows much about — or they are likely to become endangered.

"Some of the species we have here today may not be here 40 years from now, but isn't that a natural part of evolution?" Helle asked about 100 people at a panel discussion on non-game legislation for Montana.

The discussion was sponsored by the Five Valleys Audubon Society, which favors non-game legislation and hopes to see it adopted when the Montana Legislature meets this winter.

Helle, a rancher who also serves on a federal research committee on animal-damage control, said he opposes non-game legislation because studying the species might lead to placing some on the endangered-species list. Every animal on the list means trouble for

A whiff of bull

With University of Montana President Richard Bowers' recently announced resignation, campus rumormongers are back in business trying to guess where Dick will go next. Assumptions bloom and fade rapidly.

The latest product of these truculent and intemperate minds has it that the president has taken to fraternizing with bovines, an irony not unknown among past UM presidents.

Page 1-C of the Great Falls Tribune revealed yesterday that one Richard C. Bowers is cross-breeding buffalo and cattle on his ranch north of Cascade. Why put up with all that administrative bull when you can experience it first hand? Why settle for half a loaf?

Alas, the connection is nothing but a bum steer, a titular confusion at best. Our Richard Bowers is no cattleman and Cascade's Richard Bowers is no university prez.

But wait a minute — we've got something here . . . how about a cross-breeding of our own?

The rumormongers are back in business.

week, was unavailable for comment. But, Friday, he sent a second letter to the employees stating that the office management would meet with the Montana Public Employees Association when he returned from trips to the Cleveland and Chicago National College Fairs.

Alleged rape results in tightened security

By GWINN DYRLAND
Montana Kaimin Reporter

An alleged Sunday-morning rape in Jesse Hall has resulted in tightened security for dormitory residents at the University of Montana.

According to Ron Brunell, UM assistant director of housing, beginning this week residence halls will be locked at 9 p.m., two hours earlier than the former nightly lock-up. Brunell said that dorm residents may also expect a stricter enforcement of a policy requiring male visitors on female floors to be escorted by a female, and female visitors by a male.

"Our intention, of course, is not to hassle residents . . . but to provide what we feel is an adequate security of the buildings," Brunell said.

Brunell acknowledged that the security changes are linked to the alleged rape. The Missoula City Police Department is investigating Sunday's incident along with UM campus security, Brunell said.

According to Missoula police, a UM student called at 4:50 a.m. Sunday to report "one female adult assaulted in the stairway" of a UM dorm. A Tuesday Missoulian article described the alleged victim as a 19-year-old UM student, and identified the Jesse Hall stairwell as the scene of the reported rape. The Missoulian reported that the student had been assaulted at about 3:30 a.m. by four men, and that no weapons were involved, though the victim's left wrist was badly bruised in the assault.

Brunell would not confirm details of the story, though he said the Missoulian's description of out-of-order elevators in Jesse Hall was inaccurate, because only one of three elevators was not working.

The out-of-order elevator, which Brunell said was "vandalized" about 1:30 a.m., serves all-male floors two through five. The remaining two elevators were working, Brunell said. These serve the sixth through the eleventh floors, where women live.

Brunell said the one elevator's doors had been jammed; something that happens "at least every other weekend" in one of UM's four residence halls that have elevators.

Lt. Bill Foust of the police department's detective division said yesterday that police had begun an "active investigation" that day. He would not confirm any details of the case.

Ken Willett, UM safety and security manager, could not be reached for comment.

A spokesman for St. Patrick Hospital acknowledged yesterday that the alleged victim had been "seen in the emergency room and released" early Sunday morning.

The 79 UM students who serve as dorm resident heads and resident assistants were told Monday by Brunell to notify dorm residents this week about the alleged rape and the earlier lock-up hour and enforced escort policy that have resulted.

But, "we're not putting up a poster that says, 'This happened,'" Brunell said. As a general rule, Brunell said, dorm RAs are not "told all the details" — just that an assault occurred, and where, for example — and they in turn are told to "respond to questions (only) as the residents bring them."

In this case, however, RAs will notify residents individually and in floor meetings because, Brunell said, students will want an explanation for the tightened dorm policies.

Dorm RAs would not answer questions yesterday about Sunday's incident, and Brunell acknowledged that they were instructed not to comment.

"Since there are so many rumors flying, we would prefer that this office make any statements," he said, adding that a "no-comment policy" about incidents under investigation protects the privacy of the victim and the accused, and safeguards the investigation itself.

Brunell said that "we have to rely on residents to assist us" in reporting "suspicious" behavior in the dorms. In any emergency, students can call 4000, which will be answered quickly by the UM switchboard, Brunell said.

Though Brunell said his office will continue to evaluate the effectiveness of campus security policies, he doesn't expect to make further changes soon.

Besides the nightly dorm lock-up, security includes the use of nightly desk clerks from 9 p.m. to 4 a.m. at Brantly-Corbin and Craig halls, which house mostly women. Clerks work on weekends at Jesse and Miller halls, which are near Arthur Avenue where Brunell said "we get a lot of transient traffic."

Incidents of rape in the recent past at UM have included a 1979 rape outside Jesse Hall, for which Jesse Sandstrom was given a 32-month deferred sentence this past spring, and a reported rape in Jesse hall in October 1979 for which the alleged victim did not press charges.

Rhetoric won't fill world's empty stomachs

Hunger is a disease — a stomach-wrenching, crippling, potentially lethal disease which has become an epidemic.

- One-quarter of the world's population is hungry or undernourished.
- One person in eight suffers from debilitating malnutrition.
- Children under five account for half of those affected by malnutrition.

Aside from inflicting human suffering, hunger also threatens world stability. As starvation mounts and people in underdeveloped countries are prevented from attaining a decent standard of living, anger, despair and even hatred of those who do eat will rise — and be channeled into aggression or rebellion.

Mass starvation is expected to infect the world within 20 years — at the very latest.

The United States, then, has a very real interest in solving the problem of hunger in Third World countries. And the way to do that is by turning our rhetorical commitments to alleviating hunger into action.

To dramatize the problem of hunger, the Fast for World Harvest is planned for tomorrow at the University of Montana. Students are being asked to give up meals and donate the money they would have spent on food to the hunger fund.

Half the money will go to the Poverello Center, a Missoula organization that offers a free meal to those who are hungry; the other half will go to Oxfam-America, one of many organizations which attempt to help the people of Third World nations become self-sufficient.

The $2,000 that sponsors of the fast hope UM will contribute is admittedly just a morsel.

It can also be argued that fasting is one of those nice, liberal do-good activities that makes us feel better about our well-fed superiority and, in effect, accomplishes little.

But fasting is more than empty rhetoric.

The Commission on World Hunger has recommended the United States up its contribution to fight malnutrition from .2 percent of the GNP to .7 percent of the GNP.

The University of Montana is being asked to increase its commitment from $1,500 to $2,000.

Neither request is outrageous given the alternative that growing world hunger poses.

So, fast tomorrow. Not because it will solve a problem as old as civilization, but because it will emphasize a commitment to the survival of civilization.

For privileged Adidas only

Q: What at this university costs $44,000 and can be used by only 12 students?

A: The wooden basketball floor at the Dahlberg Arena.

Stupid, isn't it? That's what we thought last weekend when we went there to play as we had done so many times before this year.

Sunday night, 7 p.m. The lights are on in the Dahlberg Arena. About 10 of us ball-bouncing heathens break away from the tedium of study and find an apparently open place to play an hour of friendly basketball. But it wasn't to be.

In another move typical of the brilliance of our Campus Security "Police," we were informed by an alert officer that our $44 rock-infested Adidas and Nike sneakers (that were obviously unfit for play upon a basketball floor) would scratch and mar and otherwise deface the polished surface of the paneled court. This paragon of university security (reminiscent in many ways of Cheech & Chong's famous Sgt. Stadanko) ejected us — along with two members of the Lady Griz and some other unsuspecting lads — rudely from the arena, where evidently only the privileged members of the Grizzlies can now tread their Nike and Adidas streetshoes.

This concerned cop, Sgt. Slobber (NOT his real name), explained to us that the "new" floor was worth $44,000 (some of which we must have undoubtedly paid for in one fashion or another), and that we — unreasonable, uneducated buffoons that we are — are unfit to participate in a normal athletic activity in this open and convenient sports facility.

What is the arena floor for? Are the Grizzly dozen the only UM students allowed to run up and down its varnished planks, and can't some of the normal people at this university share in the fun?

And what will be sealed off next? Will the Men's Gym soon be off limits to women? Will the Women's Center lock its doors to the male population of this school? And next year will the UM Marching Band members be forced to wear bleats when they march out onto the field at halftime?

We hope not, but with the situation in the hands of our culpable Campus Cops, God only knows.

Lost our wits?

Editor: We, the students of the University of Montana, are willing to pay $1,400 plus for a former and unreformed leader of the Ku Klux Klan to speak to us? Have we lost our logical and moral wits?

David Duke is sly with words. He quit the Klan because of its "violent image." Yet he doesn't say he's against violence, or the Klan's violence, or even that he thinks the Klan is violent. Now under the new image of "free speech and equal rights" he is invited to speak at the U of M.

The issue is not freedom of speech; our money supports Duke. He is a racist, promotes racism, and may even use our money to promote violence against blacks.

Everyone knows he will not be coming to start a new civil rights movement. So why pretend? To support Duke with our money is to support the Ku Klux Klan and everything it represents. We can still say no. And if we have any self-respect and respect for other people, we will.

Boring attitude

Editor: Re: Fat C. Lam's Public Forum.

I hear you being negative. I hear you perpetuating the problem. I hear you throwing away your own and society's responsibilities. I respect your attempt to be realistic, but I think in doing so, you are creating/choosing your own reality. As long as your hand stays where it is, you are right — nothing will change. We will all be doomed to our "stages of idealism" — our "growing pains" out of which will come inevitable acceptance of the way things are. Forced by trite pressures to "get the food on the table," or to afford that car that — face it — you are going to need to get to your job and back to a passive acceptance — however unwilling — of what should be questionable needs or at least questionable methods, mindsets and lifestyles.

When you start with the assumption that the fundamentals will or cannot change, that it is just a matter of time and personal rebellion (blowing off youthful steam, leaping on and off pedestals and bandstands) and "growing up" before we will see and accept the reality or what it takes to "get by" according to your own stagnant definitions, of course there will not be change, and idealism does become "an idea whose time will never come given the savage of man."

But what about challenging that savage; what about demanding from ourselves a sense of responsibility and accountability? We were not born savages. Our willingness to give in, to sell out, has put us where we are — now a spineless and submissive society forever evolving around to the same place, anticipating the inevitability of everything and probably relishing the helplessness that results. With this helplessness comes the abandonment of responsibility and a sense of the futility of rebellion or assertion. If we are going to improve our lot, there are many things that will have to change. One of the most difficult but crucial changes involves the attitude reflected in your article — selling out.

I think your attitude is boring.

Limits to idealism

Editor: I admire very much Mr. Paul Walker's fine article on idealism in the Nov. 18 Kaimin in response to the one I wrote earlier. He made his point succinctly when he said, "Idealism is necessary to balance out our tendencies to stagnate and degenerate in the midst of complacency. Idealism is the tool we must use to improve the world, its societies and governments." However, I must correct two statements he made in regard to my former letter.

1. He said I was not alone "in believing that everyone over the formative years must come to grips with reality and eventually blend into Corporate America." I never used "everyone" in my letter and "eventually blend into Corporate America" is not necessarily my belief.

2. I was totally shocked that he said I "tend to discourage social criticism." My letter was an attempt to diagnose/analyze the causes which separate the college students from the older generations. Idealism was the cause I came up with. How come I was accused of "discourage social criticism"? Wasn't it a personal attack?

Otherwise, I admire Mr. Walker's letter and hope he will "continue to learn and grow as an idealist," as he hoped. But I should add that many former radical and liberal leaders in the 60's have "conformed" and view their past as something childish. Witness Huey Newton of the Black Panthers, Abbie Hoffman of the Chicago Seven, and Stewart Brand who published the "Whole Earth Catalog." Brand is now a neoconservative, admits errors past. He now says: "We were all outlaws who became responsible citizens." (Newsweek, Nov. 17) These and the other examples were what prompted me to conclude that as people get older, their views will change.

Idealism will, with most people, fade over time. These leaders, when asked in the 60's whether they would change and "conform" someday, scoffed at the questioners. But I do hope Mr. Walker will keep to his, as he hoped.

UM and MSU unite to push funding requests

By ALAN ROSENBERG
Montana Kaimin Reporter

Marking a new spirit of cooperation, alumni from the University of Montana and Montana State University will host a reception for legislators and their spouses when the new session opens in January.

Deanna Sheriff, executive director of the UM Alumni Association, said the reception will be an example of the "united front" the two campuses will present to the Legislature in an effort to have budget requests funded.

On budgetary matters of mutual concern — higher faculty salaries and bolstered library acquisitions — Sheriff said she expects the universities to cooperate with each other.

Personal income up 1.1 percent during October

The personal income of Americans rose 1.1 percent in October, matching September's increase and helping boost people's spending by a full 1 percent, the government reported Tuesday.

Economists inside and outside government saw the trend as further evidence that the nation is slowly recovering from the recession, particularly in heavy industries that were hard-hit by the downturn. They cautioned that rising interest rates could damage the apparent recovery, however, and added that double-digit inflation—over 12 percent for the year—is eroding virtually all the increase in income.

However, she said the "coalition" between the campuses might be in jeopardy when the Legislature debates the universities' long-term building requests.

UM has requested $8.6 million for a fine arts building which would house the university's drama, dance and radio and television programs. MSU requested $4.6 million for the construction of a visual communication building.

Although a Board of Regents' review of the radio and television programs offered at both universities found no serious duplication in course offerings, the buildings are often seen as a cause for rivalry.

Sheriff said that although she remains optimistic that the fine arts building at UM will be funded, she didn't expect the university to receive the entire amount requested.

"We may not get the whole pie at one shot," she said. "It's awfully hard to get that much money in one session."

Goals for the "coalition" were discussed, and plans for the reception were made Thursday in Helena at a meeting attended by UM President Richard Bowers, MSU President William Tietz Jr., Commissioner of Higher Education John Richardson and Sheriff.

The reception, for which no date has been set, is an example of "a new grass roots approach" to the university's legislative lobbying effort, Sheriff said.

Until now, most of the lobbying has been done by university administrators, faculty and students," Sheriff said.

At the reception, alumni and supporters of both universities will come from "all over the state" to tell their representatives that "this business of higher education is important," she said.

"We (administrators, faculty and students) can go to the Capitol from now until doomsday and we can state our case. But the most powerful message is from the people who don't go to the university, who don't work there," Sheriff said.

What we will be trying to do, she said, is "show what two different universities with vastly different curricula can mean to this very large state."

Law school oligopoly

College Press Service

Nearly 60 percent of the nation's law school instructors received their legal education from a select club of 20 law schools, according to a new study by the American Bar Foundation.

Donna Fossum, the attorney and social scientist who conducted the study, reports that a majority of the professors and deans at the approximately 160 accredited law schools went to school at one of the following institutions: Harvard, Yale, Columbia, Michigan, Chicago, N.Y.U., Georgetown, Texas, Virginia, Berkeley, Pennsylvania, Wisconsin, Northwestern, Stanford, Iowa, Illinois, Minnesota, Cornell, Duke and George Washington.

In fact, she reports, almost 14 percent of all law teachers received their basic law degree from Harvard.

But Fossum wonders if the oligopoly of law school teacher production by these 20 elite schools may not be dangerous.

"Is it wise that the power to produce the legal profession's 'gatekeepers' rests so completely in the hands of a few elite law schools?" she asks.

One effect, she concludes, is that "people interested in becoming law teachers must accommodate themselves to this elitist process."

Moreover, she warns, the domination narrows the educational and legalistic outlooks of the nation's law schools. With law school teachers so alike in their educational credentials and early career experiences, it may be even harder to reach diversity among the next generation's lawyers.

"In short, these law schools apparently have so dominated the field of law teacher production over the years that even the arrival of women and minority law teachers has not injected diversity into the group," Fossum adds.

Bulletin changes proposed

Proposals concerning the current University of Montana bulletin, graduation with high honors and residency requirements will be discussed at the Faculty Senate meeting tomorrow.

The Academic Standards Curriculum Review Committee initiated the proposals which Faculty Senate will vote on.

Under current regulations, if a student interrupts his or her attendance a year or more, the student must graduate under the bulletin under which he is readmitted.

The bulletin change would allow a student to use any student bulletin under which he has been enrolled during the six to eight years prior to graduation.

The current bulletin allows a lapse of six years to complete degree requirements under a particular catalog, but the proposal would allow six to eight years.

The proposed change concerning graduation with honors would require students to have a 3.4 grade point average or higher at graduation, and a 3.7 G.P.A. or higher to receive high honors.

In addition, the examination, which high honors candidates were previously required to take, will be eliminated under the proposal.

The current bulletin also requires students to earn a 3.1 G.P.A. or higher to receive honors, or a 3.5 G.P.A. or higher to receive high honors.

The bulletin change for residency requirements requires students to earn at least 30 of the last 45 credits at UM for graduation.

The current bulletin requires students to earn at least 35 of the last 45 credits at UM for graduation.

The reasoning for changing the regulation to allow the transfer of 15 instead of 10 of the last 45 credits, is that the bulletin would be consistent with residency requirements for a second degree.

Fee waiver program may face reduction

By STEPHANIE HANSON
Montana Kaimin Reporter

The amount of money the university system receives to operate its fee waiver program may be more than it needs, and the whole program is now under scrutiny.

Fee waivers in the university system total $1.5 million. That figure is $1 million more than has been authorized by law, according to Lynda Johns, a member of a committee studying the fee waiver program and assistant director of the Financial Aids Office at the University of Montana.

The committee is studying possible changes in the program which may involve the elimination of certain fee waiver categories. The committee, composed of one representative from each of the university units, will make its recommendations to Commissioner of Higher Education John Richardson early next year.

Drastic changes in the program are unlikely however, according to Johns.

"Any significant departure from the status quo (of the fee waiver program) would be detrimental to certain programs in the university system," Johns said.

Currently, each unit determines its own qualifying categories within a general framework that students must comply with.

Waivers are granted by the state's colleges and universities to students on the basis of scholarship, service to the school (such as teaching assistantships or athletics) or on the basis of need.

Last year, about 900 students received fee waivers at UM. A portion of tuition and incidental fees can be fully or partially waived for both in-state and out-of-state students who qualify.

Students who qualify for fee waivers include graduate research and teaching assistants, athletes, National Merit and high school

Honors Scholarship recipients and faculty and staff.

A 1972 state statute authorized each university or college to grant fee waivers for two percent of its full-time enrolled students.

However the Board of Regents authorized the schools to grant waivers up to six percent of their student population. Waivers are then received by slightly more than one out of every ten students in the university system.

Currently two conflicting statutes exist concerning fee waivers.

The first is a 1972 statute which specifies that the units in the university system may grant fee waivers to two percent of its full-time students who qualify in a number of categories.

The statute identifies six waiver categories. They are:

- Native American students.
- honorably discharged veterans from Montana who do not qualify for any other federal funds.
- war orphans.
- dependents of prisoners of war.
- senior citizens.
- students from custodial institutions such as the Mountain View School for Girls in Helena.

The other statute states that the Board of Regents has ultimate authority over university system operations, contradicting the legal definitions regarding fee waiver guidelines. The Regents' policy on waivers does in fact include the six legal categories, plus nine more.

Johns said she believes the conflicting statutes are the cause of the problem.

A possible remedy would be to eliminate some of the unused categories authorized by law, such as waivers for war orphans and dependents of prisoners of war.

Many of the categories authorized by the 1972 statute for fee waivers — especially for Native Americans — pre-dated federal grants that now fund those students, Richardson said.

To keep the waiver program at its present level of operation would require funds from another state source, Johns said. But this would only be "robbing Peter to pay Paul," she said.

The committee is currently "just tossing ideas around now" on ways to change the program, Johns said, but it is "totally unrealistic" to consider eliminating fee waivers, she said.

Some of the programs that would suffer most would be the teaching assistantships and the athletic programs, she said. Both rely on student fee waivers to sustain the programs and to attract students.

Richardson said another aspect of the study will cover fee waiver practices in other states. Most colleges and universities do not offer fee waivers to their students, he said.

However, most schools offer comparable financial aid through scholarships, he said. For example, Oregon does not grant fee waivers to its student athletes, but because its schools are in the Pac-10 conference they receive large revenues from bowl football games, he said. That is not an option for Montana, he said.

Richardson said he hopes the study can be completed early next year.

Coming This Christmas

Air quality rules to be considered

HELENA (AP) — A largely conservative membership has been appointed to a bipartisan special subcommittee, which is to make recommendations to the 1981 Legislature on the state's air quality rules.

The committee will hold its first meeting tomorrow at the State Capitol, Room 139, beginning at 2 p.m.

Named by the Legislative Council to the new Select Subcommittee on Economic Problems were: Sens. Steve Brown, D-Helena; Harold Dover, R-Lewistown; Pat Goodover, R-Great Falls, and Carroll Graham, D-Lodge Grass and Reps. Gene Donaldson, R-Helena; Dan Kemmis, D-Missoula; Chris Stobie, R-Thompson Falls, and Joe Quilici, D-Butte.

Goodover, Stobie and Quilici represent districts where air quality restrictions have been applied against industry. Dover, Graham and Donaldson have previously taken skeptical views on government control of industry.

On the other side are Brown, the former state Health Department lawyer responsible for the initiation of efforts to write more stringent, enforceable air pollution rules, and Kemmis, another lawyer, and member of the state Environmental Quality Council who has defended the present rules.

The Legislative Council adopted a resolution several days ago citing the recent closures of Anaconda Copper Co. processing plants in Montana as evidence of a need for a detailed look at the air quality rules and other factors affecting the state's industrial economy.

In addition to its task of evaluating how the state rules relating to fluoride, sulfur dioxide and particulate pollution compare with federal and other states' air quality regulations, the subcommittee was told to answer two additional questions:

- What economic benefits are available for workers and businessmen displaced by plant closures either as a direct result of the closures or due to secondary effects of the closures?

- What sorts of comprehensive economic development plans do other states have and what are the basic legislative elements of those plans?

That last question may fit in with what Gov. Thomas Judge says will be his last major legislative campaign before leaving office.

Judge said in a recent interview that creation of a full-scale economic development agency in state government — the first major drive of his political career as a young state legislator — will also be his last major effort.

Judge said he will propose turning the present Department of Community Affairs exclusively into an economic development agency, transferring its human services functions elsewhere.

The new legislative subcommittee was also given broad additional authority to "propose to the Legislative Council other issues it believes should be explored," but it must receive council approval before expanding its primary study.

'Zero chance' for liberal pot laws

College Press Service

The gradual trend toward easing federal penalties for marijuana possession was probably stopped and even reversed by the November 4 Republican landslide, according to Gordon Brownell, executive director of the National Organization for the Reform of Marijuana Laws (NORML).

Brownell, in an interview with Zodiac News Service, says the victories of Ronald Reagan and conservatives in the House and Senate have given federal decriminalization laws a "zero chance" of approval during the next four years.

For proof he points to Sen. Strom Thurmond (R-SC), who will become chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Catholic education increases

College Press Service

WASHINGTON, D.C.—Despite predictions that the 1970s would produce a severe decline in the stability of Catholic colleges and universities, a recently-released report indicates enrollment at those schools during the past decade increased by 19 percent.

The report, conducted jointly by the Association of Catholic Colleges and Universities and the National Institute of Independent Colleges and Universities, shows that enrollment between 1970 and 1978 jumped from 450,000 to 535,000 students.

The unanticipated leap takes into account the fact that 22 of the 250 Catholic higher education institutions closed down during that period.

"It has been reasonably assumed that Catholic colleges and universities are subject to the same pressures that worry all the independent sector in higher education," the report said, "such as the long-anticipated effects of declines in birth rates, the ever-widening gap between the prices of attendance at public and private institutions and the declining interest in traditional liberal arts curricula in favor of more directly career-oriented programs."

But the report adds that the impressive record of the 1970s, coupled with enrollment projections, makes it probable that "Catholic higher education ought to be able to face the eighties with as much confidence as any segment of independent higher education."

Still, the outlook is not completely bright. One statistic from the report shows that students at Catholic colleges become increasingly more dependent on student financial aid during the 1970s. Eighty-five percent of the students needed some kind of financial assistance.

In addition, nearly half of the Catholic school undergraduates in the 1970s came from families with incomes of between $12,000 and $24,000 and 15 percent from families with incomes below $6,000.

WANTED: TUTORS

A tutoring program for UM students is being put together in the Center for Student Development. Funds provided by ASUM and the University Center will be used to partially defray the cost of tutoring sessions for students who need them.

We are seeking tutors with the following qualifications:

- Sophomore status or above.
- Overall G.P.A. of 2.5.
- 3.0 average in course(s) you would like to tutor.
- Ability to obtain departmental approval as a tutor in the course(s) to be tutored.

Rates will be $3.75 per hour for tutors who are sophomores & juniors, $4.05 for tutors who are seniors & graduate students. Interested students should pick up tutor application forms in Center for Student Development & return by Tuesday, Nov. 25. Prospective tutors may address questions concerning the program to Maggie Doolen in CSD 243-4711.

California colleges feel budget cuts

College Press Service

Even as tax-cut advocates across the nation tried to convince voters that their ballot measures would not adversely affect colleges, California educators were steeling themselves against the long-delayed but potentially-devastating effects of Proposition 13, the original "tax revolt" measure that spawned nine imitators on November 4.

Many of the worst effects of Proposition 13—the June 1978 ballot measure that cut Californians' property taxes by 50 percent and thus cut the amount of money available for education and other civic services—are just now beginning to be felt on campuses, administrators say.

The effects had been forestalled by a huge Marshall Plan-like program of paying for education out of funds from the state's large budget surplus. The surplus, however, is nearly depleted, and education programs have no other means of support.

Officials figure the real belt tightening will come during the 1981-82 academic year. Community colleges in particular are busily outlining their priorities to determine which programs will go.

Arthur Ellish, dean of instruction at Fresno City College, says a fundamental re-examination of the college's programs has been proceeding ever since it was told that no more bail-out funds would be available.

"No doubt in my mind that there will be a reduction in programs here," he says. "We are going through a traumatic course evaluation procedure to put everything into a priority matter." From that list of priorities, the administration will choose which programs to kill, depending on what funds are given to it.

"The only reason we're still here is because of the state. That's why our doors are still open," says Ellish, "and that's why we have a future."

The new wave of anxiety, Ellish recalls, was started by a report from Gerald Hayward, chancellor of California's Community College System. The report says that without bail-out funds, state community college budgets will only increase by the same percentage state income rises. Hayward says various estimates show the state's revenue will go up by two percent at the most, while the inflation rate alone is expected to be eight percent.

"It's a pretty gloomy forecast," the chancellor admits. "The question is whether the state will somehow re-order its priorities, or whether it will allow many colleges to cut back severely."

Before that decision can be made, though, it seems the state must first confess there will indeed be no more bail-out funds available for these schools. Lonnie Mathis, a budget analyst for the governor's office in Sacramento, claims, "No decisions whatsoever have been made as to the availability of bail-out funds as well as future state allocations to higher education."

He said those were political decisions which would be made by the end of the year.

Upon hearing that news, Hayward laughed and said it is "absolutely false." He repeated that a host of unrelated estimates show the surplus has been almost completely depleted.

"Everybody knows that the money just isn't there. We had better prepare for it before it's too late," he said.

Though community colleges will be the hardest hit, the prestigious University of California system will hardly remain unscathed. Already the crunch has forced the system to refuse pay raises for faculty and has delayed much-needed maintenance work, according to Vice Chancellor Tom Jenkins.

Jenkins says it is too early to speak of definite, specific cuts, but did suggest that research programs across the state could be the first hurt by a slash in state allocations.

"You obviously can't do the same thing with less funds. And with enrollment up, we'd probably have to put more of our money into regular classes," he said.

But at some community colleges, cutting research funds is the least worry. Ellish projects full-time professors will have to be fired and sparsely-populated classes eliminated before the next academic year. He says it may get so drastic that tuition would be imposed for the first time.

"Eventually, we could get tuition here. We now have the only tuition-free community college system in the nation, but unless we get more help from the state, that won't be true much longer," Ellish said.

Sam Schawerman, vice president of the El Camino Community College System, agrees that tuition may not be avoidable. He claims that would have devastating consequences for those seeking higher education in California.

"So many students will not be able to go to school," Schawerman says, "if it is not free. Some people say that without paying any money students feel it's easier to just drop out of school at any time, and with tuition they'd feel the obligation to stay. I say that at least they tried to make it in school, and with tuition they would have never had the opportunity."

Tradition beats new investment at Harvard

CAMBRIDGE, Mass. (AP) — Harvard University, in an effort to preserve traditional academic values, will not buy shares in a new commercial venture involving genetic engineering, says President Derek Bok.

Bok said yesterday he still hoped to find a way for Harvard to make profits in business without compromising its values. The school has an endowment of $1.6 billion, the largest in American higher education.

Under a proposal Bok presented Oct. 21 to the faculty, Harvard would have become a 10- to 15-percent stockholder in a company that would develop for commercial use discoveries made by Mark Ptashne, a Harvard biochemistry professor, in the field of recombinant DNA.

ranchers, Helle said, because some of them are harmful but cannot be controlled since they are protected by the endangered-species act.

But panelist Bill Thomas, information officer for the Montana Department of Fish, Wildlife and Parks (FWP), disagreed. He said finding out more about animals will actually help to keep them off the endangered-species list.

"One of the quickest ways for an animal to get on an endangered-species list is for the federal government to call and find out that the state doesn't know anything about it," Thomas said.

He said some examples are river otters, bobcats and lynxes. The federal government found out that the FWP knew little about these animals and is trying to take over management of them, he said.

"Right now we have our backs against the wall defending Montana's right to manage" the animals, and "we don't have adequate information," Thomas said.

Thomas said Montana's Legislature has given FWP the responsibility to manage most game and non-game animals but "since 1973 there hasn't been any funding."

The FWP has attempted to fund non-game programs by selling $5 certificates "that entitle you to nothing," except maybe the pleasure of knowing you have supported the animals, Thomas said. "Last year we sold 120 of about the dress code and that they plan to take the case to the next bargaining session.

She said the restriction of blue jeans was "not enforceable because it's undefinable."

"Jeans are fashionable," she said.

Another employee, Irene Peterson, said she disliked the code and has told Royan so. She said Royan told her he would not change his mind until MPEA brought the matter before the bargaining table.

Meiers would not comment about the possible consequences faced by employees who wore jeans during the interim between Royan's order and the bargaining session.

She said that under the union contract guidelines, violators of the verbal order could not be fired immediately. They could, however, receive a "red letter of warning," which would go into their personal files, she said.

those, for a total of $600. That's not funding the responsibility that was given us by the Legislature," he said.

Another panelist, Les Pengelly, a University of Montana wildlife biologist, noted that the FWP has also sometimes used funds from hunting-license sales to finance non-game research. But he said FWP is critically short of funds and added "funding is a critical issue."

The non-game bill considered in the last legislative session — which Audubon members plan to try to resurrect — would have funded non-game programs by a voluntary tax check-off. Under this plan, taxpayers wishing to donate to the fund could do so when they paid taxes.

"If you're going to have a tax, I guess that's the ideal thing — a voluntary one," Pengelly said.

Helle disagreed. "It sounds all right, but where does it stop?" he asked, and suggested that next year somebody might want a special tax check-off for pheasant counts, or for buying hay for deer and elk. And then "here comes the cancer fund, the heart fund . . . it opens up a precedent."

But Audubon member Woody Baxter, another panelist, said he had surveyed six of the seven states that now use a tax check-off to fund non-game programs, and none of them had reported check-offs being sought for other purposes.

Two of the panelists had advice for supporters for non-game legislation. Rancher Land Lindberg of Greenough said supporters must get together with farmers, since farmers own most of the lands non-game species live on.

"I just can't believe that some of us hard-nosed ranchers can't get together with some of you raving environmentalists and work things out," he said.

Howard Ellis, a former legislator who was elected to the Montana Public Service Commission this month, said supporters should work with the fish and wildlife committees of the Legislature to "do it from the inside out and see that it's built into the FWP where it belongs."

Frederick Bell, a member of the Ravalli County Fish and Wildlife Commission who said he has specialized in non-game studies for 47 years, said ranchers need to recognize the good things done by animals they consider unimportant or even harmful. He said ranchers have often eliminated wolves and coyotes only to find their land over-run by rabbits; have killed the rabbits — and some birds along with them — with poisons, and have then been forced to use more poisons to kill insects the birds would have eaten.

Thomas, the FWP information officer, noted that predators are controlled by the state's Livestock Control Board. While that body can pass regulations, he said, the FWP could not pass regulations concerning non-game species. He said the FWP wants mostly to study the species and to educate the public about them, although he added that enforcement of existing regulations is also a priority. But the FWP disapproves of spending money intended for game management on non-game species, he said.
