PSc 342 Media and Public Opinion
Spring 2001

Course Description
An examination of mass media's effects on American politics and public policy. Despite extensive research and informed opinion, the extent of the mass media's power remains the object of considerable debate. For example, is the mass media a "change agent," or rather an institution easily manipulated in support of the status quo? Primary attention focuses on the ability of the mass media to perform its "democratic function." Other topics include the media's influence on public opinion, for example, election outcomes; the adversarial relationship between the press and other political actors; "attack journalism" and proposals to improve the media's role in the development of a democratic citizenry.

The Classroom Learning Environment (authored by Dr. Ronald Perrin, Professor of Political Theory)

Wherever the learning process takes place (for example, in the library or the seclusion of one's study) it does so best if there is a minimum of distractions. This requirement poses special challenges for the learning that takes place in the lecture hall or the classroom, where the possibility of distractions is the greatest.

In order to establish and maintain a supportive learning environment for my students I will not tolerate the few individuals who might be prone to a) come to class late or leave early, b) carry on private conversations during class, or c) use the lecture hall/classroom as an opportunity to read material, such as the Kaimin, that is not relevant to the subject matter under consideration.

The only exception to these conditions concern students whose work schedules or unanticipated appointments require them to arrive for class late or leave early. In these instances I would appreciate knowing of the circumstance before it occurs and, in all such instances, request that students do so an unobtrusively as possible. Thank you.
