CB forks out cash to local filmmaker

By Susan Toft
Montana Kaimin Reporter

After quite a bit of discussion, Central Board voted last night to deplete the special allocations fund and award it to local filmmaker Swain Wolfe.

Wolfe will receive $725 from the fund to help finance his film "Idea and Identity."

The board also passed a resolution asking students to honor the Missoula County High School picket lines.

The resolution is "in response to comments heard by CB members throughout the day concerning students working for $75 a day. (CB) asks students to measure their priorities and not be swayed by the attraction of the money over the ideals of education."

CB faculty adviser E.W. Pfeiffer, who raised the issue toward the end of the meeting, said he "hates to see the university get involved" in the teachers' strike and requested that CB take some sort of action to dissuade students from going to work at the high schools.

The board disagreed on several points regarding passage of the resolution.

Board members Tom Agamenoni and Garth Ferro wondered whether any action CB might take would have any bearing on whether University of Montana students go to work at the high schools.

UTU contract: two-year 'peace on the land'

By Doug O'Harra
Montana Kaimin Reporter

If ratified, the new two-year contract between the University Teachers' Union and the University of Montana administration will mean not only substantial increase in faculty salaries and compensation, but also a more decentralized evaluation process, an earlier start for the next negotiations and "peace on the land" for two years.

UTU members will vote on the contract Wednesday and the Board of Regents will consider the contract at its June 26 meeting.

As opposed to the 4 percent increase plus $250 this year, faculty salaries will increase 12 percent next year, and 11 percent the following year.

news analysis

In addition, faculty promoted next year will have $1,270 added to their base salary. Those promoted the following year will have $1,425 added.

More than $70,000 will be available for merit raises over the two years, and more than $220,000 for salary adjustments in those areas with lower-than-average salaries. Those critical areas will be selected by the UM administration.

Donald Habbe, UM academic vice president, said the salary settlement was the most important aspect of the proposed contract. It leads to "visible improvement" in the faculty compensation, he said.

Charles Bryan, mathematics professor and chief negotiator for the UTU, agreed. "I think it's nice that I have a raise that comes close to matching what inflation will be."

The faculty evaluation process also will be different — ASUM no longer will appoint the student committees and design the questionnaires. The entire article in the contract about faculty evaluations was completely reorganized, making the language "more clear," according to Bryan.

Instead of ASUM appointing the members of the student committees, the chairman of each department (or dean if there is no chairman) will select at least three department majors and one non-voting faculty member to conduct the student evaluations of the faculty.

Rather than using standardized, campus-wide questionnaires like those used by ASUM now, this committee will design an evaluation process specific to the academic area of the department.

Handling the evaluations has "proven to be an administrative nightmare to ASUM," said Bob Brown, student bargaining representative. Brown, who sat on the administrative side of the table, said the evaluation process "was a real concern" of the UTU team. He said the UTU felt the ASUM committees just weren't performing, and wanted to see the evaluations handled "expeditiously."

But "students were not written out of the process," Brown said. Just the mechanism for selecting the students was changed.

Both Bryan and Habbe said there were numerous faculty complaints about the evaluations. Bryan said the evaluations were late and often lacked enough written information to be useful, and are too important to the faculty to allow ASUM to handle them.

In another issue affecting students, an official complaint form was designed for use in the formal student complaint procedure.

Under the proposed contract, which would be in force from July 1 until June 30, 1983, the negotiations for the next contract will start

One-man job service closes after 26 years

After 26 years of teaching forestry, University of Montana Professor William Pierce is calling it quits. "Time to retire," he said flatly.

Some students feel "I'm leaving them in the lurch, but most of my students are seniors and they'll be leaving too," he said.

When Pierce first started teaching at UM, it was required that students work two summers in a forestry-related job to get a degree. No one was helping the students find jobs, so "I started it by default," he said.

Even though the two summers of work is no longer required, Pierce still has a reputation as a one-man job service within the forestry school.

Pierce coordinates a requisition program in the forestry school, in which potential employers send job opportunities to the university, asking for applicants.

Many of the other schools also do this, but the key is that Pierce knows almost every employer personally because he's been around so long, according to one forestry senior.

Every forestry student interviewed agreed that Pierce has a gruff demeanor at first—but it doesn't last long, they were quick to point out.

"When you first meet him he's kind of dry and intimidating," said Wayne Brainerd, senior in forestry. "But you can't know a better guy once you get to know him. This school just doesn't have a better professor."

He is gruff at first, but "if you go in and ask him for something he'll usually drop everything and do almost anything for you," Brainerd said.

Mike DeGrosky, junior in forestry, said Pierce has "got a way of scaring freshmen. He gets a kick out of flustering them," he said.

As a freshman, DeGrosky said he went in to talk to Pierce about a job interview.

WILLIAM PIERCE cracks a rare smile.

"He gave me the treatment, and all I wanted to do was to get out of his office as quick as I could. So I started backing out of the room saying 'thank you, thank you.' Then I turned around and kicked over the garbage can. So I was putting garbage back in the can and saying 'I'm sorry, I'm sorry,' and I looked up and he had this big grin on his face. That's when I realized that he wasn't a bad guy."

"He's a helluva nice guy," DeGrosky said.

Pierce, 65, came to Missoula in 1940 and worked as a border patrol officer at Fort Missoula, where foreign citizens were detained during World War II.

After working for the Forest Service from 1946 to 1955, he began teaching at UM in 1955.

A Lincoln, Neb. native, he was in charge of 10 courses that were taught every year. Because he is a full professor in charge of many classes, he predicted that it will be difficult to replace him with an assistant professor, which the administration is planning.

"When you get someone who is green, it's hard to keep a program going," he said, adding that he would like to see a system used by many private colleges started at UM, in which a trust fund is set up so that the school can recruit and hire other full professors instead of hiring assistants.

Pierce said he didn't know who his replacement would be, but "I'm sure he's not going to teach 10 courses."

Pierce received his master's degree in forestry from Yale University, and his bachelor's degree and doctorate in forestry at the University of Washington.

During his 26 years here, Pierce said, he hasn't seen much change in students.

Forestry students used to "dress like bums," he said, but they lost that form of identification during the 1960s.

Foresters are "becoming better dressed than the liberal arts" students now, he said.

Quarters or semesters? Decide for yourself

A committee of the Faculty Senate will vote next week on a proposal to switch the University of Montana from a quarter system to a semester system perhaps beginning as early as 1983.

There are several ways to look at this issue, but they all point to one conclusion: the proposal needs more study.

The Academic Standards and Curriculum Review Committee has suggested semesters would save money because there would be one less registration period and one less quarter of grade collections. Also fewer drop/add forms would be processed, a further savings.

Not only are there economic reasons for the move, supporters contend, there are also benefits for students. A semester system would allow more extensive subject study, rather than the shopping cart approach offered by the quarter system.

Students also would have the jump on summer employment by getting out in early May, as opposed to mid-June, the proponents say, a second benefit for students.

Another advantage of the switch is that it would authorize faculty to do a housekeeping of their courses, cutting out the deadwood and adding courses that require the extensive study that a quarter system cannot allow.

There are drawbacks to the move however. The arguments are that semesters trade breadth, or the opportunity to take a wide variety of subjects, for depth, or the opportunity to study a subject extensively. Diversity should be the key word for a liberal arts school such as UM, opponents say.

Also, if a student decided to drop out or not attend school for personal or employment reasons, he would miss one-half of the school year rather than one-third. This could lead to potentially lower enrollments.

Benjamin Stout, dean of the forestry school, argues that switching to semesters would interfere, rather than help, summer employment prospects. Students who work for the Forest Service generally are not needed until June and often can work through late September.

Actually the state is split: Montana College of Mineral Science and Technology, and the private schools — the College of Great Falls, Rocky Mountain College, Carroll College — are on semester systems of some sort. UM, Montana State University, Northern Montana College and Eastern Montana College are on quarters. Western Montana College, after three years of study, is switching to semesters this fall.

These schools have cited national studies that indicate a "massive" national trend to switch to semesters. Fifty-four percent of the country's schools are on a semester system.

When Larry Pettit was commissioner of higher education from 1972 to 1987, he instituted a study to transfer the Montana University System to semesters.

But present Commissioner John Richardson said yesterday that his office is not studying such a plan. "I think that an academic calendar is more of a local issue than a system issue," he said. But such a switch may make more economic sense for the entire university system, rather than piecemeal implementation. It also would reduce headaches caused by transferring the credits earned at MSU's quarters to UM's semesters.

No matter what the plan, student participation in this decision is imperative. ASUM needs to act quickly, perhaps appointing students who will be around this summer to work with the senate committee. Student opinion polls need to be conducted. It is their method and philosophy of education that may be reorganized.

Licensing journalists only benefits countries with something to hide

By Greg Gadberry
Montana Kaimin Columnist

Imagine, if you will, an identity card. It is small, white, covered with plastic. Every journalist, every news photographer, every broadcaster in the world is required to carry a copy of this card. It is a license. A license to practice journalism.

Sound farfetched? It isn't. For months, the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) has been debating whether to set up a special system that would license the journalists of the world.

What's worse, the plan appears headed for approval. Delegates — particularly from Soviet-bloc and Third World nations — have gleefully defended the plan. They see it, no doubt, as a way to silence trouble-making journalists once and for all.

Laughably, this plan has been defended as a program to "protect" journalists. Promoters claim that if a government is aware of who journalists are and where they are working, that government will be able to protect them from the lies of nasty people.

But there is a catch: each country would have a voice in the issuing of these licenses. And if a country decided a particular writer isn't friendly enough toward it, that government can have the license revoked. No license. No story.

Thus, tin horn dictators around the globe will have an effective way to combat the journalists who attack them.

And who knows? Maybe the United Nations will provide these despots with ways to punish people who practice journalism without a license. And then no one, either New York Times reporters or small-town pamphleteers, will be safe from the wrath of the oppressors.

Yet this should not be perceived simply as a blow against journalists; but instead as a blow against all forms of free expression.

Free expression is a basic right of all people. It is a right no government — no matter how benevolent — should be able to take away. Free thought and expression are cornerstones of civilization and countries without these cornerstones can become little more than collections of automatons and slaves.

But the director general of UNESCO, Amadou Mahtar M'bow of Senegal, has said repeatedly he hopes to implement the licensing plan. No one knows just how extensive this program will be. But it's a sure bet that the world's despots are clapping their hands with glee, and readying their torture chambers for the rash of people caught informing the public without a license.

New Right

Editor: "What kind of country are we?" All of us, long before we were aware of the meaning of the terms "liberty and justice for all," recited them, by rote to be sure, every morning in pledging our allegiance. Have we learned, yet, their weight and force? Do we realize the hopes and dreams these words signify for America's children and for millions of people around the globe?

Are these hopes and dreams realized by U.S. sanction and encouragement of the racist regime in South Africa, a barbarous military junta in El Salvador, the fascist dictatorship in Argentina, by further military adventures while the Vietnam veterans must struggle to get their due?

Is our domestic future a return to the inhumane policies of the 1800s: abandonment of equal rights and opportunities for minorities and women, of security for the old and sick, of the Bill of Rights, of the minimum wage laws, and the wise use of our nation's resources?

An affirmative answer to all of these questions is the foreign and domestic policy of the New Right.

It is our contention that the New Right's policies amount to the militarization of America at breakneck speed. Billions of dollars are pouring into the military machine with no conscience for social costs.

We are deeply disturbed by the moral blindness of the New Right. We do not believe that the majority of Americans yet realize the tragic consequences of their "Right is Might" mentality. The future for which we sacrifice must not be a return to the darkest errors of the past.

To reclaim the promise of America, public and frank discussion of these issues must begin in communities like ours. To challenge the megaton and megadollar statistics with the flesh and blood realities, we invite you to meet with us Saturday afternoon, June 6, at Caras Park. On this Day for Peace, the implications of stumbling back into war will be addressed from the variety of perspectives and with the truthfulness they demand.

negotiate with the Forest Service over claims to land in the Black Hills National Forest. The booth will accept donations.

LIGHT is a local organization involved in securing rights for renters and low-income groups.

Saturday evening, a benefit dance for Vietnam Veterans of Montana and Montanans for Peace in El Salvador will be at the Loyola Sacred Heart gymnasium, Edith and Tremont Streets. Music will be provided by Blue Yonder, 25-cent beers will be served, all for a $2 admission fee.

• Ken Wolff, president of the Vietnam Veterans of Montana, will outline the plight of the survivors of the Vietnam War, and the military dehumanization process.

• Stoney Burke, an ex-fighter pilot who flew over 100 missions in Vietnam. Besides personal observations, he will present current information on the draft situation.

• Judy Smith, from the Women's Resource Center, will examine the plight of social programs in the face of budget

The Rainbow Family Gathering is an annual Fourth of July get-together in the Northwest that celebrates freedom of religion and right to assembly.

The Yellow Thunder Camp is a recently started community in the Black Hills of South Dakota by a group of Lakota Indians. Barry Adams of SAC says the community is in need of food and camping equipment while they

The speakers and their topics are:

• Ann Mary Dussault, Missoula representative, will speak on local and state political issues.

• Monsignor Arthur Mertons. Now in the Catholic diocese in Spokane, Mertons spent 15 years as a missionary in Guatemala. He will speak about his experiences in Latin America and the problems the people have in deciding their own destiny.

• Bill Cunningham, Montana's Wilderness Society representative, will speak on the need for peace in order to enjoy nature, and the amount of natural resources needed to fight a war.

Brown says UM rates high in affirmative action programs

By Heidi Bender
Montana Kaimin Reporter

On a national basis, Lynda Brown gives the University of Montana a fairly high rating for the number and quality of women employed in professional and administrative positions.

As the director of the Equal Opportunity and Personnel Services office at UM, Brown handles matters ranging from personnel to programs for the handicapped to affirmative action programs for minorities and women on campus.

Brown said she sees the limited number of promotional opportunities at UM as the major obstacle to administrative advancement, not only for women but for men as well.

Women are assuming mid-management positions, but have nowhere to go, she said.

The Equal Opportunity and Personnel Services office is in the process of refining a promotional plan, which it has been working on for quite some time. The plan hopes to create incentives for the classified staff at UM, she said, adding that it should be ready for presentation to the new president for approval Fall Quarter. Brown said the plan develops a series of career ladders, in which staff already employed at UM is recruited for openings in higher administrative positions.

In addition, a formal grievance procedure for non-union staff was submitted to UM President Richard Bowers a few months ago, but action probably will not be taken on it until fall, she said.

Providing facilities for handicapped students on campus has been one of Brown's priorities since she first joined UM in 1977.

Because of inadequate funds, many problems still exist, she said. For example, UM has not been able to provide the money for the installation of an elevator in the Journalism Building, Brown said.

But overall, Brown said, she was "really pleased" with the progress made at UM, saying she feels the campus has been educated to the needs of the handicapped.

Brown joined UM as EEO officer in 1977 after she and her husband came to Missoula from Connecticut, where she had worked as the director of career development at Central Connecticut State College.

She was EEO director in 1978 before assuming the title of EEO and personnel director with the combination of the two offices.

Criticism has been leveled at Brown's combined role of EEO and personnel director.

Jerry Bromenshenk, ecologist in the UM botany department and president of the Staff Senate, said most of the staff at UM saw an "inherent conflict" of interest between acting as an employee advocate on one hand and working closely with the administration on personnel matters on the other.

For example, when Brown was involved with collective bargaining last year, she was sitting on the administration's side of the table, he said.

However, Brown said criticisms she has heard from the UM staff "don't hold any water." As an EEO officer she was still "on the fence," responsible for explaining the rights of employees in discrimination matters and for advising the university on legal courses of action, she said.

Brown said she enjoys her job and the new challenges it offers every year.

According to Brown, sexual harassment will be the "number one target area" of the Equal Opportunity and Personnel Services office next year.

The office hopes to hold several workshops and training sessions on the subject, she said. Although few formal complaints have been received, they have heard a lot from the Women's Resource Center about sexual harassment of students, she said.

Brown also said she has been enjoying the benefits of living in Montana.

When she and her family lived in Connecticut, they had to drive to New Hampshire to ski, whereas it is right at hand in Missoula. In addition, she likes horse-packing into the mountains, running, soccer and tennis.

Missoula is not the "hick town" some people claim it is, she said, adding that she thought the cultural opportunities were "incredible" for a town of this size.

entertainment— Stewball—Montana's native son

By David Stevens
Montana Kaimin Fine Arts

The open road, the wind to your back—many musicians at one time or another dream about hitting the road—going solo, with nothing but their guitar and their backpack.

The idea sounds vaguely romantic. But reality isn't so kind; few musicians last very long and even less flourish.

Stuart "Stewball" Johnston is one of the few musicians that has been able to survive in this hostile environment.

In a conversation with "Stewball," I asked why he liked performing solo. He responded, "I like the sense of having control over your own destiny." Stewball, a multi-talented instrumentalist, also felt that a solo format was a more effective means of showcasing his diverse talents. Stewball played bass and shared singing and songwriting in the country-rock band Dogwater.

Stewball's music reflects his diverse and eclectic influences. His father was disc jockey and a jazz pianist. His interests and tastes had a decided impact on Stewball's musical direction. Stewball's first musical experience was singing in an Episcopal Church choir.

Although Stewball's music falls in the genre of "folk" music, he also incorporates rock, country and jazz into a distinct sound that could only be called his own.

The bleak landscape that surrounds his home town, Cutbank, also has had an impact on Stewball's growth as a musician. The people are as hard as the land, and that feeling of non-acceptance is often reflected in the lyrics of his music:

STUART "STEWBALL" JOHNSTON with Dogwater.

Ah, but come, let me drink to your health
It kills the depression and helps me forget that this wind is a part of myself.

(Copyright 1980 Stuart J. Johnston)

The life of a solo musician has its drawbacks but "It is not as if you're selling a product, you are selling yourself—something you can believe in."

His booking agent and friend Chris Roberts of Meadowlark Ventures informed me that "Stuart has a lot of energy. If some of my bands had as much energy as Stuart they would have become big stars."

Stewball's combination of talent, pluckiness and insight into the music business has been beneficial—he is about the only solo artist in the Northwest who has been able to earn even a modest income.

Stewball's optimism and his strong confidence in himself has been the fuel that has powered him through many years on the road.

And as Stewball pilots his small foreign-made pickup to the all too numerous community colleges and bars, he reflects that one day, he too will make it.

State may adopt strict flouride standards

By Hymn Alexander
Montana Kaimin Reporter

Editor's note: this is the first in a two-part series.

Ranchers in Silver Bow and Flathead counties are among those hoping the state Board of Health adopts strict flouride standards for industry.

According to Dr. Paul Bissonette, a Deer Lodge veterinarian who since 1964 has treated cattle and horses that were adversely affected by flouride, said if the board adopts standards favored by industry, area ranchers will lose money from damaged cattle, poor hay crops and decreased land values.

Stauffer Chemical Co., near Rocker, and Anaconda Aluminum Co., near Columbia Falls, currently are the only two Montana industries that emit enough flouride in their production processes to possibly be affected by the standards the board will adopt in their July 17 meeting.

Scientists do not believe flouride is harmful to humans, Hal Robbins, Air Quality Bureau chief of the Department of Health and Environmental Sciences, said yesterday.

Small amounts of flouride are applied to children's teeth to retard tooth decay.

But flouride is known to be harmful to many plants and animals, particularly horses and cows that feed on grass, hay and silage containing high concentrations of flouride, Robbins said Tuesday.

Last summer the Board of Health set flouride-in-forage standards at 20 parts-per-million. Industries said the standard was much too low, and that they would be unable to comply. No one disagreed and the board repealed those standards this winter. That left the state with no flouride ambient air or in-forage regulations.

Because of a law passed by the 1981 state Legislature, the state cannot adopt any ambient air standards for flouride, only in-forage standards.

Joan Miles of the Environmental Information Center said Tuesday that the bill exempting standards for flouride in ambient air didn't please the EIC because it has not been decisively proven that gaseous flourides are not harmful.

Dr. John McGregor of Great Falls, chairman of the Board of Health, said Tuesday that although he can't speak for the whole board, he felt "the minimum standard the board will go is 35 to 50 for the growing season."

"35 to 50 for the growing season" means an average of 35 parts per million in-forage concentrations that are monitored within a six-month growing season from spring to fall. The company is allowed a 50 parts per million in-forage reading during one of those months, but the six-month average must not exceed 35 parts per million. The actual growing season will be determined by the board.

Don Ryan, lab supervisor for Anaconda Aluminum, said his company could comply with the 35 to 50 growing season standard.

"In fact, we are probably complying with it most of the time now," he said.

Employees of Stauffer Chemical Co. said only plant spokesman Jack Canavan could comment on the company's position, and he would be out of the state all week.

However, McGregor and others said Stauffer testified at the Board of Health meeting that it could not comply with the 35 to 50 growing season standard. It favored a 40 to 60 to 80 standard.

A 40 to 60 to 80 standard means industry would be permitted an annual average of 40 parts per million in-forage flouride reading, 60 parts per million for two consecutive months and a one-month reading of 80 parts per million.

Stauffer, however, may be proposing a standard they cannot comply with. The 40 to 60 to 80 formula would force them to conform to an annual average of 40 parts per million in-forage flouride concentration.

Robbins said his department does not think Stauffer could not conform to that standard.

Board of Health member George Lackman, Missoula, said yesterday "it is the general feeling of the board that Stauffer could not comply with the 40 parts per million annual average," even though that is the standard they presented of the board.

McGregor acknowledged that the 40 to 60 to 80 standard is one of the options the board is considering.

Robbins said Anaconda is within the 35 to 50 growing season standards the board may set. Anaconda does "quite a bit better" than Stauffer in controlling flouride emissions, he said.

According to his department's studies, Robbins said Stauffer "is close to or meeting" the 35 to 50 growing season standards. He said Stauffer had about as good a flouride emission control system as a plant its age can have without additions.

However, Bissonette said yesterday he feels neither standard would adequately protect ranchers from large economic losses due to flouride contamination of livestock and forage.

He bases his argument on more than 17 years of work on flouride effects in Silver Bow and Deer Lodge counties. He said he has treated cows with extensive bone and tooth damage from eating forage with high concentrations of flouride.

Tomorrow — Stauffer's payments to ranchers for flouride-related damages are secret.

$75 per day for people to preside over classes. The administration said that no teaching experience or background in education is necessary.

There were questions as to whether the board would be actually representing the views of the entire student body by approving the resolution. But board member Bjorn Goldis said that if his constituency does not agree with the way he votes, a recall effort could be started.

The special allocation to Wolfe came after the board voted to deny a $700 special allocation to Montana Masquers for their summer theater. Proponents of giving money to the Masquers said that, unlike Wolfe, the Masquers are a student group — and students would directly benefit from the allocation.

But supporters of Wolfe won the argument by saying that, by funding Wolfe's project, it is board's "chance to show we're intelligent, responsible adults and not just students that hand over money."

Fire on the mountain

The call came in about 8 p.m.: had we seen the fire on the mountain?

It sure looked like a fire. Somebody — a weird religious cult, perhaps — was burning a fish? an infinity sign? next to the "M" on Mt. Sentinel.

Quick as a turtle in heat, a reporter charged up the switchback trail past the posts cautioning against off-trail hiking on what is known as "UMUC" — the University of Montana Upper Campus.

But no fire was sweeping the green grasslands. Instead, David Stewart, senior in philosophy, had organized a "political statement" made of plastic.

In the afternoon, Stewart and a half-dozen cohorts had shaped black visquine into a giant "X" beside the familiar "M" to spell out the initials of the ubiquitous roving missile system the Pentagon would like to splay across the Western landscape. Next, the legs of the "X" were moved to make a huge fish — the Christian symbol of salvation. With just a pause for the message to hit home, the fish was reshaped to the Greek infinity sign — like a figure eight turned sideways.

As the sun set, the infinity sign was hacked to pieces.

The meaning? Stewart wouldn't say. But the message was important enough that the wild-eyed philosophy student willingly suffered "incredible blisters running around this mountain" to get it across.

So take heed, Missoula.

Goldis said that "Campus drive doesn't just go around the university; it goes out into the community." He also said that giving money to Wolfe would be "giving student money to something worthwhile, not just something that is purely recreation and entertainment."

In other actions CB:

- ratified board member John Smith as chairman of Student Union Board.

- ratified board member Anitra Hall as chairwoman of the committee investigating making the Montana Kaimin independent of ASUM.

- heard a final report from Aber Day Committee Chairman Barry Adams on Aber Day.

- heard a report on the recently completed collective bargaining from student bargaining representative Bob Brown. (See related story on p. 1.)

news brief

By THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Atlanta murder suspect in custody

A warrant has been issued for the arrest of a man who is "the strongest suspect to this point" in the killings of several of Atlanta's 28 slain young blacks, a source close to the special police task force investigating the killings said last night. An Atlanta station, WSB-TV, reported that the FBI had a man in custody and was questioning him, but he had not been placed under arrest. The source described the man as black and about 30 years old. The ABC television network and WSB-TV said a police team watching the Chattahoochee River late last month heard a splash and upon investigation spotted a man who told them he had dumped trash. On May 26, three days later, the body of Nathaniel Cater, 27, was found in the river near the same spot, according to the broadcast report. Cater had been strangled, medical examiners said. The suspect has been under surveillance since the splashing incident. Members of the special task force searched the man's house Wednesday for nearly 5 hours and emerged with several bundles.

Watt is subject of conflicting petitions

Interior Secretary James Watt, charged with shepherding much of the nation's public lands, is the center of two conflicting petition drives. A spokesman for the Sierra Club, which is circulating petitions calling for Watt's removal, says the group expects to gather "several million" signatures and drive Watt from office. Wyoming state Rep. Marlene Simons, R-Beulah, said a group calling itself Outdoors Unlimited, Inc. hopes to gather two million signatures endorsing the controversial secretary.

earlier. Instead of starting seven months earlier, as it is required under the current contract, negotiations will have to start seven-and-a-half months earlier.

This early start will allow the bargaining teams to meet several times before the 1983 Montana Legislature convenes, Bryan said. The negotiations were protracted this year because of the Legislature.

Another difference in the proposed contract is its two-year duration. While the language of the current contract was in force from July 1, 1978 to June 30 of this year, faculty salaries and compensation were renegotiated in 1980.

"It's a real advantage having a two-year settlement," Habbe said, because there is a "degree of settlement and peace on the land."
