COURSE DESCRIPTION

The course studies the formation of a distinctively American political culture with particular emphasis upon the meaning and place of democracy within that culture. Accordingly the course adopts an interdisciplinary approach with which students consider a variety of sources; historical, theoretical, and literary. Included among the required readings are selections from the writings of Thomas Jefferson, James Madison, Alexander Hamilton, Alexis de Tocqueville, Ralph Waldo Emerson, Walt Whitman, John Dewey and Martin Luther King, Jr. Students will also be required to choose from a representative list of current works in American political thought, using at least one such work as the subject of a term paper and class presentation.

Note: This is a 'W' course. In addition to regular class meetings each student will meet for a minimum of two tutorial sessions with the instructor. The purpose of these sessions is to review early drafts of the term papers. These reviews will address the style, as well as the substance, of the papers.

* This is normally a three credit course. Students should enroll for an additional credit of Independent Study (U 196)
