Book Review
January 1, 1999

Smith, John. American Foreign Policy in the Nuclear Age. New York: Random House, 1989. 369 pp.

The standard book review format to be used in this class should have the heading indicated above and include the following three features: 1) brief identification of the author and a statement concerning what "the book is about" in the first paragraph (or two), 2) a summary of the contents of the book (the middle 80 % of the book review) so that a reader of the book review will understand the book, and 3) an assessment of the book (perhaps with a comparison to similar books by other authors or other books by the same author).

For stylistic reasons, it may be appropriate to combine the summary and assessment sections of a review. It is important, however, to let the reader of the review "see" the book standing on its own merits before condemning or praising it. A review should not be simply an essay expressing one's opinion about a book. "Quotes from the text," it should be noted, " can be cited with a simple parenthetical note." (p. 2) Margins should be 1" on all sides (1 1/2" permissible for left margin); right margin should never be justified. Page numbers should be center-bottom (otherwise no page number on first page) or upper-right of page. Indicate name/institutional affiliation at end of review.
