Course description:

MUS 380, 480, and 559 are weekly private lessons in composition, and project-based studies that cover the theory and realization of various compositional techniques and concepts. Students will explore the craft of musical composition through the creation of original musical works, and also study techniques and repertoire of composers from the past century.

Course Objectives:

- To develop one's own compositional voice and artistic interests
- To develop knowledge of a broad range of contemporary art music repertoire
- To gain experience thinking critically about contemporary music

Required materials:

- Manuscript paper, pencils, eraser, and a ruler
- Listening assignments, readings, and additional materials may be assigned

General expectations:

- Active participation in weekly class activities by showing up prepared with composition work, or other materials to review
- Provide printed / paper scores for each of your weekly lessons, not scores on your laptop
- Reviewing assigned listening and reading, so that you are able to actively participate discussions and activities

Schedule:

Lessons will be scheduled by appointment, in my office, room 203.

Evaluation and assignments:

Students will design and outline in writing a work-plan that outlines their projects and goals for the semester. This should be prepared for the first lesson of the semester. This will include composition work, and may also include repertoire study, theory, and other supplementary work that will support one's learning goals.

A grade will be assigned based on adhering to the general expectations of the course (outlined above), and also: attendance, creative effort/growth, commitment to developing new skills, consistent and continual progress throughout the semester, incorporating feedback from lessons into one's composition work, and the completion of all tasks outlined in one's work-plan.

Attendance is mandatory, and excessive absences will be reflected in your final grade.
