FOREWORD

In order to have the 1921 Sentinel in the hands of the students before they go home for the summer vacation, and in order to complete all business matters pertaining to it, we did not attempt to make the record of spring athletics and other spring activities complete.

So let this 1921 Sentinel be a record of the school year from March, 1920, to March, 1921.

In Memoriam

Edwin Boone Craighead

President of the State University, 1912-1915

Died October 22, 1920

There are many principles and many traditions, dear to the University, which we owe to Dr. Edwin B. Craighead, three years the head of the institution. No man of the strong personality of Dr. Craighead can be closely associated with three generations of students and not infuse much of that personality permanently into the body whose affairs he administers.

It was Dr. Craighead who awakened Montana to a realization of the potential greatness of the University; it was he who presented to us our first vision of the Greater University. While he was president the first movement took place toward a realization of the broadened scope and the high ideals which he proposed.

Fine scholar that he was, eloquent speaker, brilliant writer and profound thinker, yet it will be as "guide, counsellor and friend" that the students who knew Dr. Craighead will remember him best. A student was always welcome in his office and many a load of trouble has been left in that room. He could be tender and he could be stern—but always the student felt that he was just.

Of his splendid mentality and his marvelous administrative ability, Dr. Craighead gave unsparingly that the Greater University might become a reality. His last public utterance was in support of plans for the furtherance of this ambition.

As long as the University endures, the fame of this man will live and passing years will add to the appreciation of his service to Montana.

DEDICATION

To the memory of Edwin Boone Craighead, whose broad vision, faithful work, and loyal support opened the way for what the Greater University is today and for what it dreams of being tomorrow, do we respectfully dedicate this book, the 1921 Sentinel.

EDWIN BOONE CRAIGHEAD

Greeting by President Edward O. Sisson

This is the fourth Sentinel for which I have been given the privilege of writing a word of greeting, so it was very natural that I should glance back over the other three, scanning not only my brief word—lest I should now merely repeat—but also the many pages full of the keenest interest to one whose heart is bound up with the State University. On the personal side it was like a reunion with the throng of faces in the book, some of them still with us on the campus, others gone out into the tasks of life, and a few, happily only a few, whom we shall not again see on earth. Who can imagine how many others likewise scan these pages, rich with memories and with hopes? The Sentinel is a kind of democratic hall of fame with a niche for every one of the University's members.

From the fascinating stream of faces and personal records one turns naturally to the mirrored image which the record gives of the great stream of events: 1918, the University completely engrossed in the War, with most of its men in service; 1919, the Armistice signed and armies dissolving into the ordinary channels of life, with rapidly increasing enrollment here as on all university campuses; 1920, full resumption of university work, but hampered by the pinch of insufficient financial resources; also a world-wide sense of disillusionment because the cessation of active warfare had failed utterly to usher in the roseate ideals of peace. Now 1921: since last year's Sentinel, the people of the State have testified their faith in higher education by passing '18 and 19;" may these beneficent measures soon begin to operate, for the needs are crying! But the largest result of these four years so far as universities are concerned is that the country has awakened to the national meaning of higher education: it is going to support it more generously, but it will also make far greater demands and apply far severer tests. We shall be much under fire; but it will do us good, both now and hereafter. And whatever the conditions and whatever the demands, the University must prosper; and its greatest prosperity lies in its greatest service.
