dredging (now inactive) and the contributed time of students, faculty and some grazing permittees.

The full use of the forest as a study area by forestry school students will not come until we can provide housing facilities on the forest that will accommodate the students without the necessity of having to travel the 35 miles that separates the forest and the school at Missoula. The first step in this direction has already been taken and can be credited in part by the contributed time provided by the 1950 and 1951 senior classes. One exercise of the spring camp work required of each class was to fell, buck, skid and assist with the sawing of 12,00 board feet of lumber. This was piled and air seasoned and with the exception of 2,000 feet used for seed bed frames by the Forestry School Nursery has gone into the construction of the first unit of what will eventually be a complete outlay of bunkhouses, dining hall, recreation and classroom, a well, an inside plumbing with a washroom and sewage disposal system. With the exception of a few details, the combined recreation and classroom has been completed. The rough board construction harmonizes with the surroundings and the knotty pine interior, a gift of the Anaconda Company, and a large fireplace gives it a pleasing appearance. The construction costs and the building of the one-half mile graveled access road was taken care of from the receipts received from two small timber sales. The continuation of the building program and the many other needed improvements on the forest will depend upon the possibility of legislative action and future revenues from the forest itself in the form of Christmas tree or timber sales.

To be of practical value as a teaching aid, a school forest should provide examples of silvicultural work, grazing and wildlife activities, forest improvement, protective methods, recreational activities, forest management plans and many other practical and technical forestry demonstrations. A good start has been made in this direction. Professor Morris' grazing plan is a model that should inspire any student. Professor Bruns established a thinning plot in a pure stand of Ponderosa pine with an accompanying check plot in 1948. Four additional thinning plots in young Ponderosa pine were completed by the class in advanced silviculture in 1951. Before the forest was granted to the state, three selective logging plots were established by the Northern Rocky Mountain Forest and Conservation Experiment Station, and are now maintained co-operatively by the experiment station and the School of Forestry. established another small plot of hybridized pine in 1950 and is now available for student observation. To assist in the teaching of watershed management, 13 snow courses were located in the fall of 1950 and have been intensely measured for the past two winters. A stream gauging station has also been set up and other watershed activities are planned for the future.

By next spring, three rustic signs, two at the entrances and a large one located at the top of the divide on U. S. Highway 93 will inform the public of the location of the forest, will give appropriate recognition of the donors, and will explain the purpose of the forest and its use; watch for it and drive in and take a look around.

Sustained Yield . . .

"Sustained yield" is a logging term. It is also a business term — and a community term — and a human term.

For these reasons:

Sustained yield in the lumber industry means good trees for the future. And good trees for the future mean good business for the Inland Empire; healthy community life from active payrolls; good jobs for thousands of people who work in the forest products field.

Here at J. Neils we take sustained yield seriously. The forest lands under our management extend over 300,000 acres. All of this is, literally, a vast tree farm.

The J. Neils Lumber Company is a pioneer in the practice of selective logging. We will continue this basic policy of sustained yield so that there will be a perpetual flow of excellent raw materials to our mills; so that we may continue to produce and sell quality forest products as we have since 1895.

MONTANA RANGE LANDS

Forage production coincides with the occurrence of spring and early summer rainfall which totals about three-fourths of the 13-inch annual average. The forage cures during late summer and retains much of its nutritive quality throughout the winter. Grazing capacity averages from 2½ to 4 acres per animal unit* month. Year-long grazing by both cattle and sheep is important but cow-and-calf operations predominate.

Foothill-Bunchgrass Range

Although greatly changed since settlement, the foothill-bunchgrass type is still a valuable grassland. It forms a rather narrow belt along the foothills east of the Continental Divide and occurs as fringe remnants in some of the drier mountain valleys. Bluebunch wheatgrass, Idaho fescue, and bluegrass, the principal species originally, have not withstood grazing well and over large acreages have given way to cheatgrass or annual weeds and sagebrush.

On the average, 4 to 6 acres are now required to support an animal unit for 1 month. Grazing in spring and fall by both cattle and sheep is the most important use now made of these foothill ranges. For ranchers dependent upon the higher national forest ranges for summer grazing, the foothill ranges fill vital gaps in the year-long operation.

Sagebrush-Grass Range

The sagebrush-grass type is typical of rather dry valleys and basins where most of the rather meager annual precipitation occurs during the winter and spring seasons. Areas of other range types may support variable stands of big sagebrush, presumably because of disturbance by fire, too heavy grazing, or other severe uses, and may often be included in this type. The principal value of the sagebrush-grass type lies in the palatable herbaceous perennials and remnant grass plants that grow under and between the sagebrush plants. Like the foothill areas this type forms an indispensable link, both spring and fall, between the home ranches and the summer ranges for both cattle and sheep. Average grazing capacity is about 9 to 15 or more acres per animal-unit month, only one-third of what it should be.

Mountain Summer Range

In the mountainous western part of Montana meadows and grassy areas which are intermingled with open pine, Douglas fir and aspen forests provide summer grazing for large numbers of cattle, sheep and big game. Big game animals also winter at the lower elevations, but because most of the type lies at high elevations, where snow comes early and stays late, summer use predominates.

Other values of these areas, such as lumbering and recreation, are important. Also, without the water stored as snow at the high elevations during the winter, many agricultural and other communities could not exist. Grazing capacity varies considerably but generally averages 6 to 10 acres per animal-unit month.

Management for high sustained production of these Montana ranges challenges every technician and administrator. Each range type presents unique problems demanding the development and application of improved uses and management practices. In the aggregate Montana's ranges, used conservatively and managed wisely, offer a promise of continued support for the state's greatest industry.

is presented by the large percentage of seeds which are only partially stained. It has been proven that not all viable seeds stain completely in the standard tetrazolium test. The reasons for incomplete staining are not known, but it has been demonstrated that the immersion of excised embryos to water prior to the test can result in the failure of the embryo surface to stain. The separation of incompletely stained viable seeds from seeds with dead areas is difficult.

Many seeds were found to have viable embryos and non-viable endosperms. This indicated that the judging of viability should be based on the endosperm as well as the embryo. It has been found that seeds with dead areas in the endosperm can germinate successfully, but there are reasons for believing that they are less resistant to disease. Poor endosperms may be a contributing cause of the difference between germination capacity and tree percentage.

The writer believes that the interpretation of tetrazolium stained seeds can be developed to a point which it could be of practical value. The present problem is to set up standards of staining which could be used to give valid and reliable germination tests.

Watch a tractor-winch-arch team at work in the woods. It bunches and yards the merchantable timber with minimum damage to young growth. It reaches out for isolated logs, cleans up the corners of the tract. This efficient team is the smoothest-working "rig" in the woods.

Carco has contributed a long series of major developments in the design of winches, arches and log carts—developments which are steadily increasing the profits to be realized from the best forest practice.
