Monet in the Fields

How I paint these haycocks is how I remember you and Manet in the garden painting Camille, with such different eyes you saw her, in such a wholly different light. How he would look at you and grimace, or whisper
so you could hear: “This Renoir, he’s no good.
You who are his friend, tell him, please, to give up painting.”
When we could, we had to pose for one another, we were so poor: Courbet on the strand at Trouville for Whistler
whose mistress sat at her toilet for Courbet.
I did Manet at his easel, and you, I posed for you that summer
while I painted the garden behind our cottage.
Such ways of seeing then, so mine now. And you must not go back to thinking that truth is only in form and line. No, think truth is a room without furniture;
you say this is so: first, a red damask chair.
You add geraniums, and it changes. You add a sofa, then images of Muybridge’s old horse running in the center of one wall, each one a facet of the truth but not the truth,
and him sitting on the sofa beside the geraniums, you add him, he is the man who makes the horse run, he is true:
he is everything and the room composes itself to his impression of it, and it all changes or remains like the lake at Argenteuil shifting from blue to green, with one catamaran or none. Manet was joking, friend, you have always had talent, and it hurts me to learn that you have taken up form and line, like Ingres, that “bourgeois Greek” (as Whistler called him), you, with such an ample eye, painting fleshy
ladies in the old fashion, of which I disapprove.
