2012

To Ernest Hemingway

Brendan Jordan

Let us know how access to this document benefits you.

Follow this and additional works at: https://scholarworks.umt.edu/oval

Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation

Available at: https://scholarworks.umt.edu/oval/vol5/iss2/12

This Poetry is brought to you for free and open access by ScholarWorks at University of Montana. It has been accepted for inclusion in The Oval by an authorized editor of ScholarWorks at University of Montana. For more information, please contact scholarworks@mso.umt.edu.
To Ernest Hemingway

By Brendan Jordan

That night I imagine you cradled your shotgun like the body of a killed ferret.
It was soft in your hands, so terrifyingly still and deep—so deep you couldn’t find the bulled lodged like a heart in the barrel (looking so much like a prison)

Your scalp peeled like a fruit-husk.
The red fruit of your brain burst seeds of withered stories across a white wall that looked more like an old, yellowed canvas.

Stories lay on the floor beside your up-turned boot-toes—they fell like dropped nickels into the gutter of your now-gone memory; they echoed hollowly like the mouthless sighs of leaf shells too old to drink sunlight.

I don’t know if you smiled or cried at the lifted latch of the trigger.
You felt the door of your life open.
You felt prose burst out like blood, all too watered down to catch, and hold, but so rich in color you couldn’t help but think of the bricks in the long-ago Paris walkways.

And I haven’t gotten yet to the moment just before, that second so filled with your longing to translate the weight of the barrel into the truest sentence you knew, into the declaration of a pain that would vanish only if you hunched over the typewriter and bled.