Once White

ONCE WHITE

Rain, and the earth bruises easily.
Home loses its whiteness and the family inside confesses: I have used paint, coins, and the language of Poland to describe him. Father, you lost us in some dream you had of your life.
I brought a photograph of a dead actor and haven’t seen you in years. A sister younger than me says to a man she loves: picture soldiers entering the small towns of Poland and firing into screams. All she has seen is the streets growing around the house, once white.
And my own work is wrong. In old movies there is romance in the shelling and the rain.
