Constraint

Julia Mishkin
CONSTRAINT

“I hate constraint. It's like the sight of blood.”
-Luis Bunuel

It's like this: New York murder victims always fall face up and they always wear pearl gray hats.

When you try to write a letter you spend hours on the date, Thursday of Jealousy, Tuesday of No Regrets:
they're still the same.

(You're standing at the top of a staircase. There's a woman hanging wash in the courtyard. The plants weave like sea anemones in the garden.

No: you have the hands of a musician.
You are chopping wood. If the tree were to fall in the wrong direction you'd lay yourself down like a worn carpet.)

It's this Trojan gift of summer, perfectly groomed but full of lies. It brings out the worst in you, and like a fig rotting from the inside the sun only makes matters worse, coming up, going down, whispering about the wilting ivy and lack of light.

As if by following a man you could learn everything, how he breaks the necks of cigarettes, drinks his whiskey neat, relies too much on luck when crossing the street. By the time you round the corner you find him face up and fallen, a letter clutched in his left hand.

This is everything.
It's addressed to you.