As you hit ground off Ol’ Staircase at the State Fair Rodeo in Great Falls, it was hard to hear vertebrae cracking above the murmur of ten thousand hometown hearts. You cowboyed-up and hid your grimace deep, walked out of the arena, stubborn, on sheer pain and took the ambulance, like a cab, front seat to emergency.

Tonight, on Tanqueray, good English gin, we vow never again to mention “broken neck.” Instead we talk tough broncs, big shows we’ll hit down South, and hunting ducks come fall. We straggle home, moon-struck, to the squawk of geese – a V of snows crisscrossing and circling the city – screwed-up, you say, when streetlight glimmer throws them off plumb.

When my bronc stomped down the alleyway that night, I knew down deep our bones and hearts were made to break a lot easier than we’d believe. I felt your arm go numb in mine, took the gate, weak-kneed, and rode with only half the try. It’s bad and good some cowboys don’t know tears from sweat. I folded both between fringes of your chaps, packed your gearbag neat as you would, and wandered punch-drunk lost, afraid into the maze of parking lot.

What's done is done, I know, but once I killed at least a dozen singles in a season, without thinking how they partner-up for life and death, how the odd ones flocking South survive that first long go alone.
