Letter to Major George Thompson from Jenny

Sandra Witt
LETTER TO MAJOR GEORGE THOMSON FROM JENNY

I have given up seeing you this winter.
By the bay window a sunny morning I saw the names of Oscar Parker and Major Corbett in the Tribune. Your name was not.
All night lying under our blue quilt
I remembered your hair blown against your throat, the steady draw of the buggy.

Snow thickens the roof of the barn as I walk to the Central House. Our room was fourteen. In the parlor I listen to the tread of men’s boots. The pine door opens and I imagine I hear you singing as you used to lying on the bed.
The amber lamp remains and through the window the prairies reach out under snow.

I dreamt you came home. Father and I were scooping oats for the Bay and the brown mare.
You lounged against the barn door in blue with epaulets and so many gold buttons.
I did not recognize you until you had gone.
Ann Butler said the horses are dying from long marches and when I watch the snow fall I feel a bird break from the sky inside my skull and plunge.

Since the last battle I close my eyes but can’t control myself. I can hear nothing by telegraph. The government claims the wires.
Years pass between the days, each morning disjointed, a bird startled from the grass, no pattern for flight. Lately I don’t know if the brown grass is a new spring or a spring we knew together.

It is small comfort to know that nothing is ever finished, that each touch we carry with us to feel again some unsuspecting morning, wheat against our thighs.
Lately I have felt a lameness between my shoulders.
Where is your heart?