Eugene Boudin's "The Gleaner"—1856

Ripley Schemm
Downwind of summer, the season, he said, didn't work out right.
I gather my hoard anyway—certain starlit conversations, a wistful parting. Mostly that hint on the wind that this is all it is,
moments I've attended,
telling a story of kernel from chaff. Old sweater drawn across my shoulders, buttoned wrong in morning haste.
Stubble cutting my bare feet, rake handle silent under my hand, a wand to my yearning for better yield, nineteenth or twentieth century. My friend in the background rakes hard, mindful of need, her back shaped to the task. Let the artist from Ecole St. Simeon mistake my stance for indolence.
Desire in the wheatfield has no title—even under a gothic sky.
My dark eyes move through the hours ahead, willing a change in scene: sheaves piled in the moonlight, rakes stacked in the barn, long skirt hiked to the waist, bruised feet eased in the stream. Place me there, Eugene Boudin, winnowed to the languid bone.
