For All You Know

CarolAnn Russell
FOR ALL YOU KNOW

You choose a day and ride it close as a daughter, loyal to invisible hairs on the arm of a small-boned girl.
At home in the glitter of a five and dime you are worth it young again and freely stupid, wear white on a dark day like a flag. This morning, your mother mouthed love when she cooked your egg sunnyside down. To go from here means pain, your guard let down, the childhood farm where all the animals have been eaten or sold.

Grandpa never loved the barn and Grandma gives her past away like someone else's china.
Where you played house in the machine-shed it was oil you smelled, not grain.
The queen, the king, you knew the truth about the humpbacked chicken-coop. From the doorway you watched far stairs ripple in grass.

It seemed yellow horses galloped the twister down Johnny's field, leaving everything unchanged. Ten years your uncle stalks that gray mouth in every bottle rising and falling with the backbone of his life. The perfectly ugly August his dream touched down high winds buckled the tracks, drove straw through fence poles.
You might have surrendered to learn it never leaves, the calm world riding the same twisted rail.

In the granite station blocked at the town's heart, you discover changing levels without moving.
It was a stairway you stood still for.
That wrestling before dawn to know the most honest thing you've ever done.
You mother yourself at last.
For all you know, the angel refused you like money.
