Haying

Peter Wild

Let us know how access to this document benefits you.

Follow this and additional works at: https://scholarworks.umt.edu/cutbank

Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation

Available at: https://scholarworks.umt.edu/cutbank/vol1/iss16/31

This Poetry is brought to you for free and open access by ScholarWorks at University of Montana. It has been accepted for inclusion in CutBank by an authorized editor of ScholarWorks at University of Montana. For more information, please contact scholarworks@mso.umt.edu.
Before adobes can happen someone has to dig a pit. it goes straight down before the jogging shovels stirring up the worst monsters, which whirl out, flume off across the desert in a column of fire laced with crackling spit, the kind that earnest Moses followed through the wilderness seeing the cities in his head. the hands however, being wiser, simply stand aside and watch it roar out like a captured bear too big and fierce for them to handle, a drunken sailor released from the hole in search of something intelligent to tear up. then it's done, the green mud at its season and the couple is installed, holding the little fluffy dog dressed in paper clothes cut from magazines, the man looking out the crooked windows to see which directions the clouds will take, the wife lifting up lids and peering down the stove, bending to the hollow roots to listen where that narrowing, those braids and clash of whispers come from.
but already the hay is shooting up white, and the men are out, earth come alive, stern earth bent over earth cutting it while the girls stand atop the stacks, lifesavers shouting down at them. but inside the family is so safe because this is all around them, so busy wondering at it. that the grass spears right up through the dirt floor between their toes, a torture
so mild they hardly feel a thing.