Hearing

Greg Kuzma
HEARING

I hear the shins aching.
I hear the mild cacaphony of tea water churning, the lungs of beetles breathing on all sides.
I hear the snore of clocks,
the sunburn on the leaves of plants
too long in a window.
I hear, through the bulging rooms,
the ineffable muster of old coats,
the memories of old medallions,
the break of their wars.
I hear, from a distance,
the mutter of towns rising,
and, from another distance,
the deliberations of progress
at the auto plant.
Now comes on the whisper of the river bearing, as if some undercurrent,
an ebb tide of the sea’s regret.
From the corner I hear
the old washbasin holding its tears.
And next to it the reluctant hush
of the broom, no longer carried forth into the antagonistic day.
Dust sleeps on trinkets, and I hear
as well the kink in the water pipe.
There is the bird, situated,
recalling warm skies.
The tree around it muted in its voice.
And now the wind rises to make a speech
and I can hear the concentration of the audience.
November has brought the snakes.
Sometimes the scales click and slide.
Now the whirr of the spinning wheel rises up out of the woolen blanket.
Now the carpet greets my naked feet
with the surging it associates
with the vacuum cleaner.
Pieces of popcorn lie fallen between counters, collapsing, collapsing.
Boots, back from the fields,
exhale in heaps, and the socks
catch their breaths.
One might hear, perhaps,
the greeting the window glass
offers the light,
its passage in between the rows
of onlookers,
the warmth of its acceptance by wood.
A tire is slowly losing itself.
Beside it a battalion of autumn leaves grows flatter and flatter, like ale.
Now is the ice age creaking the shadow makes descending the wall.
Now is the sponge forlornly drying
on the counter top.
A lightbulb fizzes up in splendid overexcitement,
then is gone.
Down at the town hall
a tremendous barrage of eyelids greet the tall young lawyer.
His pace slackens, his cheeks give off
the bask of gratitude,
his pant crease snaps like a rope.
And I can hear the bullet of starlight shot a million years ago
plunk down into my glass of beer.
And I can hear the ball of string hugging itself.
Now there is the sound of batteries
oozing their resources.
Now the little chainsaw of the fly.
Deep in the pond the bass wavers.
High over the house a cloud,
suddenly filled with a rising dust,
sneezes.
And there is the music of strings
plucked once, then set aside,
still resonant in the sound board.
The chopping block with its hacks.
The bandaid cupping the pulse.
Sometimes, late at night,
I hear the moon waiting for summer,
the sleep, deep in the earth,