HOLY GHOST

The man who compiles dictionaries or writes travel pieces likes to see a farmer out mowing or pitching hay in his shirtsleeves while behind him his bonneted wife is upstairs in the wavering candle of the farmhouse slashing mattresses, yelling like a searchlight, throwing saucers and pictures out the window in a rage because she can't be the Holy Ghost.

To that man he's the baseball player of the plains, a preacher who through his labors all day is his own best sermon,

And while he proceeds into town bearing his future history, swatches of newspaper clippings stuffed in his pockets,

He dreams of the clodhopper coming around the door of the barn with an armload of martingales, as usual his face forlorn at the prospect, to confront the wondering, bulbous horses who look at him disappointed, about to think of the answer to a crossword puzzle, of him reaching over to pinch his wife at night and making her really scream like a marsh entering the turmoil of sunset.

Nevertheless it's too late as he rolls out the plans, gathered above the tavern with the obsequious county commissioners.
In his head he doesn't see the farmer joined behind the corncrib by his six stalwart sons, all chewing tobacco and looking just like him, new planets that wobble out of the pine trees armed to strangle their sisters.
